Judging by the strange misapprehensions into which even the most intelligent men fall in criticising THE INDEX, although its statements are put before them in black and white for their leisurely consideration, there is nothing surprising in the inaptitude of a mixed audience to receive the thought of a speaker unrefracted by their own preconceptions. It is impossible to suppose that the editor of the Illustrated Christian Weekly intentionally misrepresents us in saying that THE INDEX "maintains that there is as yet no proof of the existence of God, etc." We believe him to be incapable of any wilful misrepresentation. But we are forced by such careless, unjust, and injurious perversions of our thought to account for them by the sentence of Mr. Galton which immediately precedes the foregoing extract:—"Every tutor knows how difficult it is to drive abstract conceptions, even of the simplest kind, into the brains of most people—how feeble and hesitating is their mental grasp—how incapable they are of precision and soundness of knowledge." For the sake of once more defining a position which is at least entitled to a careful and fair statement from all who undertake to criticise it, we ask attention to the following propositions:—

1. THE INDEX is simply a free platform, identical with that of the Free Religious Association, for the discussion of all religious questions. It neither maintains that there is, nor that there is not, any proof of the existence of God. It treats with equal respect the opinions of all real thinkers, and is hostile to unreasoning dogmatism and ignorant assumption alone.

2. The editor of THE INDEX, as one of the speakers on this platform free to all phases of thought, holds that modern science as it is (and still more as it will be) gives abundant grounds for believing that God exists—that infinite Mind is immanent in Matter, as eternal Force, Law, and Life. But in advocating this theistic or pantheistic philosophy of the universe (the former being regarded as the truer epithet), he claims no advantage, in THE INDEX or out of it, over those who advocate a different philosophy, except so far as his private belief shall be found to be better grounded than theirs in reason and science.

3. THE INDEX, therefore, does not "maintain that there is as yet no proof of the existence of God;" nor does it maintain the contrary. It neither affirms nor denies, but simply offers an opportunity for every thoughtful person to urge his or her own faith or unfaith on equal terms with every other believer or unbeliever.

4. Still less does the editor of THE INDEX maintain any such conclusion. On the contrary, he believes that there is overwhelming proof that God exists; that Nature is Mind expressed in Matter; that universal science, physical on one side and spiritual on the other, is one vast proof of God, and will be recognized as such when humanity has become strong-eyed enough to see one half of the truth without losing sight of the other.

Whoever comprehends the above very simple distinction between THE INDEX as a platform, neutral because free, and the editor of THE INDEX as one of the individual speakers on it, claiming no advantage over any other speaker, will doubtless avoid such misrepresentations as that above quoted from the Illustrated Christian Weekly.

GOLD AND BLOOD.

The declaration of Recorder Hackett, in his address to the jury in the Westfield explosion case, that "if common carriers should be made responsible for accidents to passengers, a great and beneficial example would be made," is one of the most hopeful signs of the times. It practically points to the same sort of protection for the travelling public that we advocated in THE INDEX, No. 64, when referring to the disaster at New Hamburg. Nothing but a heavy fine for every accident to passengers (not directly due to their own carelessness) will ever prove a safeguard against these horrible periodical butcheries.

Cupidity itself, if stimulated by some stringent law of this sort, will devise means of obviating them. The explosion of the steamer Ocean Wave, near Mobile, by which another hecatomb of victims has just been immolated at the altar of corporated avarice, and the terrible disaster at Revere, near Boston, follow close on the heels of the Westfield explosion; and numerous other catastrophes have also been almost simultaneously reported. In the name of humanity, we renew our demand for protective legislation against the cruel and voracious greed of gain which now annually massacres hundreds and thousands of helpless travellers; and we charge the apathetic public, careless of others while self is safe, with being an accomplice in these infamous crimes. It is the duty of every citizen to make his voice heard in denunciation of this cold-blooded slaughter, and in vigorous appeal to the law-making power to interfere at once in the only efficient manner. The great transportation companies have bribed, cajoled, or intimidated even the press into silence on this subject, and turn legislatures round their fingers in ill-disguised scorn. Let the people speak in such tones as shall be heard above the roar of business, and overthrow the tyrannous combinations that now gag all protesting mouths. For every life or limb lost, make them bleed gold at every pore, until avarice itself shall render them decently humane. There is no other efficient means of prevention.

We congratulate the Boston Commonwealth on beginning its tenth volume so prosperously. For several years before starting THE INDEX we subscribed to it, and (what is more) read it; and to-day it is one of the very few exchanges that we make it a point to read thoroughly. On the whole, it is but justice to say that no weekly paper within our knowledge is conducted with better taste, greater raciness, or more unquestioned ability. Now and then, as in its strictures a couple of years ago on Ex-Gov. Ashley, we have thought it unjust; but even in this case its prejudice was born of a noble jealousy for equality of human rights. Especially are its book-notices remarkable for rare excellence, although the writer (unknown to us) has several times expressed misapprehensions of our own standpoint in religion and philosophy; and the Commonwealth is fortunate in having such a critic in its employ. It is a pleasure to speak of any paper in terms of such unqualified praise as those we can honestly use concerning the Commonwealth; and we hope its prosperity will increase in geometrical ratio to its age.

We must add our tribute of deep respect to the memory of Dr. Gannett, who was killed at Revere by criminal railroad mismanagement. He was an old-school Unitarian, earnest and sincere in his convictions and high above the atmosphere of ecclesiastical trickery which is suffocating the souls of too many of his younger coadjutors. For Unitarianism we have little respect left; but to such Unitarians as Dr. Gannett we pay the glad homage of an involuntary veneration. Although constitutionally conservative and unfitted for the reformer's work, he lived a genuine life according to his own views of duty and truth; and what can any one do more? The world will be unspeakably happier and better when all men are as blameless and upright as he.

Our opening article this week is from an English magazine; and we republish it as a very interesting "sign of the times," showing how the great Christian Church is disintegrating in Holland under the persistent influence of modern enlightenment. The author, a "London clergyman," is evidently an honest man; and his testimony is doubly valuable, as coming from an unwilling witness. The same progress of disintegration which he describes as going on in Holland is going on everywhere; but the regret he expresses at this prospect will be unshared by those who believe that the Christian Church must give place to institutions better fitted to benefit modern society.

Goethe makes Teresa say in her first conversation with Wilhelm Meister—"I cannot understand how any one can believe God speaks to us through books and histories. If the universe does not immediately explain our connection with Him, if our own heart does not explain our obligations to ourselves and others, we scarcely can expect to derive that knowledge from books, which seldom do more than give names to our errors." He who cannot read the sacred text of Nature, above all that of sweet and pure human life, will discover nothing in the Bible but ghost-stories. Its great thoughts will elude him.

A deliberately indulged fault is a pin-hole in the dyke. Through it soon pours the ocean.

CORRECTION.

In the advertisement of the Publications of the Free Religious Association in another column, a typographical error has been standing for the last month which has made a little confusion. The report noticed in the first paragraph is that of the last annual meeting, 1871, and not, as it has been printed, for 1870. In every case of application for Reports I believe I have understood which was meant, but in one or two instances have been a little uncertain. If any mistake has occurred, I shall be happy to rectify it without any additional expense to the applicant. The essay on "The Sympathy of Religions," by Col. Higginson, was also intended to be advertised, but seems to have been omitted. The advertisement is now corrected, and attention is again called to the publications therein named. The report for 1871 has been in good demand. The Essay by Mr. Weiss on "The Attitude of Science to Religion," which treats especially of the moral and religious aspects of the Darwinian Theory, is attracting a good deal of attention, and is alone worth the price of the Report. Mr. Frothingham's sharp and brilliant paper on "Superstition" will also greatly interest many readers. The Liberal Christian has devoted a long editorial article to it, written undoubtedly by Dr. Bellows, which, while acknowledging its caustic power, criticises it severely. Many persons will want to see what it is that Dr. B. says he so "cordially hates," when he speaks of the "spirit and conclusions" of this address.

YEA AND NAY.

I suppose it has struck every one as a curious fact that in theological discussion it is with great difficulty that either party understands the other. In other matters, however great the disagreement may be, the disputants, if familiar with the subject, understand each other's language, and can go at once and intelligently to the consideration of the main question. But in religious thought and conversation, the difficulty is such that the most diverse thinkers seem to find it hard to recognize their opposition, or pretend to do so, insisting that it is a mere "war of words," and that they are not far apart in substance, only each preferring a special form of speech.

The main cause of this trouble is obviously an inexact or ambiguous use of terms which has nearly always characterized religious thought. The absence of precise definition has been so great as to make the same page a jumble of words used in many different and even opposing senses, and to leave theology the only one of human sciences without a definite nomenclature and idiom of its own. While the first botanist of this country speaks with pleasure of the minute accuracy of description which is possible through the botanical nomenclature, the religious community is now divided upon the meaning of the word Christian, which is the name by which nineteen centuries have known their religion in a large part of the world. The interest of this controversy turns on two remarkable facts:—first, that the term in dispute is the general name for the whole religious system, whence we may conclude that many terms included under it must be also ambiguous, since, if all the parts were precisely understood, it would be easy to define the general title which is but the sum and circle of the parts; second, that the controversy is waged curiously between a few who urge that the term should have a definite historical sense, of precise and specific application, and a vast number who insist that its generous ambiguity is one of its most endearing features, indeed a mark of religious liberty and charity, and that it should be left to the pleasing latitude of popular usage concerning it, wherein it means anything from Romanism to common honesty. The difference is between those who wish to know what they are talking about and those who wish to talk about everything without knowing it.

It appears to me that this pernicious fondness for an extensile terminology, which may mean as much or as little as any one pleases, affiliates religious language very closely to slang. I have been accustomed to think that the essence of slang consists in its vagueness and indefiniteness, whereby the same word serves a multitude of uses. This variety of meaning is an indispensable adjunct to a meagre vocabulary, whose slender resources of expression compel the compromise. Even profanity may admit of a similar explanation. Probably all vileness of speech would cease, if the riches of language were as readily at hand as the emotions and thoughts which crave for utterance in some shape. Take, for example, the slang word "bully." Anything may be bully from a book to a dinner, from a deed of charity to a prize fight. The essence and convenience of the word, as slang, is its value to a scant vocabulary on account of the universality of its application. How similar is the case with the theological terms which are praised most of all for their indefiniteness! If there be an important difference, it is in favor of the slang, since the ambiguous phrases so dear to theology may indicate meagreness rather of moral earnestness and intellectual honesty than of vocabulary; and, like slang, they limit and confuse the flow of thought and feeling by leaving their delicate shades and discriminations without expression.

RELIGION AND MORALITY.

Dr. Channing, in one of his printed discourses, has some strong words specifically stating the idea that true religion is synonymous with personal virtue and holiness. He says that great harm is done by representing that Jesus and Christianity have anything higher or better to give than motives to true character and living. He would make goodness—not salvation, not blessedness as anything apart from goodness, but simple goodness—to be the one grand aim and end of all vital religion. And Dr. Orville Dewey has two or three fine discourses, which, though written a generation ago, will well repay the reading, devoted to setting forth the "identity" of religion and virtue. The older Unitarian preachers seem to have dwelt upon this point more than do those of the present day, and pushed it, perhaps, somewhat too far, making too little account of the religious sentiment. There is certainly a difference between the religious sentiment and the moral sentiment, though religion and morality, in their highest and purest forms, must converge to one result.

Yet whatever is to be said in behalf of the religious sentiment—of its origin, its permanence, and the need of its culture—it surely cannot be too emphatically taught that religion can never be legitimately or safely divorced from morality. And at this day, when religion is made in its popular forms so easy, when it presents so few crosses to bear, when so many persons not merely of questionable virtue but of proved immorality do not seem materially to suffer in their social or ecclesiastical standing, when, in fact, the administration of religious institutions has fallen very much into the hands of shrewd, worldly-minded men who are determined at all hazards to make them a financial and material success,—at such a time there is especial need that it should be proclaimed with all the force possible that, whether, philosophically speaking, religion be identical with goodness or not, practically it must identify itself with true character and living or else declare itself worthless. The better statement would probably be that religion is identical with true manhood rather than that it is identical with virtue,—since manhood is a term that includes the proper culture of every sentiment and faculty that legitimately belongs to human nature.

We do not honor, but degrade and injure religion, whenever we attempt to separate it as an interest by itself apart from the life that is to be daily evolved out of the normal affections and aspirations of our common human nature. This process of separation is the method of man in a rude state of thought and civilization, and a tendency to this method prevails just in proportion as unenlightened views of religion hold their influence. The ignorant masses of every religious faith appear to believe that religion consists mainly in ceremonies, and fail to connect it with moral conduct. But the most enlightened believers in every faith will tell us that the ceremonies are of little account without purity of heart and virtue in deed. Increasing intelligence brings everywhere the conviction that religion is no interest separate from the natural development of our faculties, that it is not an excrescent or grafted growth upon our natures, but a certain quality of life itself,—the true development, activity, and efficiency of all these very affections, faculties, and impulses that make up our natures and weave day by day the outward history of our lives. That these faculties and affections somewhere come into contact with the infinite Energy and Law of the universe and draw their life from that, cannot be rationally doubted, and the recognition of that contact involves the religious sentiment; but this recognition cannot be complete until it individually ultimates itself in the development of true manhood and true womanhood. The grand aim and end is to produce the highest possible quality of character.

And all religious teaching that does not keep this aim in view does harm to the higher religious interests of man. It is popularly taught in Christendom that it is more important to make people "Christians" than to make true men and true women. So in Mohammedan countries it is regarded as the first religious duty to a fellow-man to make him "Mohammedan." And the devotees of the various sects into which the great religions are divided are, as a rule, more zealous to make converts to their particular name and belief than to make good specimens of manhood and womanhood. That is, religious name and belief are placed above character; the means are regarded as of more value than the end.

But earnest and thinking people are everywhere beginning to suspect the fallacy of this teaching, and are learning to ask whether it would not be an easier task to strike directly for the main point,—the improvement and elevation of character. It is an easier thing at this day, among thinking people, to make them understand what true manhood is than what "Christianity" is; easier to get their assent to goodness than to "piety." Why not then aim directly at true character, in respect to the constituents of which there is much more general agreement, and let the differing beliefs and ceremonies take care of themselves?

Men urgently need to be remanded back, away from the artificial and traditional dependencies of religion, to the simple fundamental virtues of honesty, truthfulness, kindness, self-respect. An old Hindu said—"Virtue is a service which man owes to himself; and though there were no heaven and no deity to rule the world, it were no less the binding law of life." Modern society needs more than anything else a strong infusion of this grand old doctrine. Religion needs it for its own salvation. People must be taught that there is no spiritual machinery by which a violator of virtue can vicariously reap its rewards. Men must be made to see that they cannot take a political bribe, or connive at roguery by professional sophistry, or stain their hands in dishonest business, or tamper with their own or others' chastity, without robbing their characters of what is worth inestimably more than reputation, if reputation be measured by the popular standards of society or even of the church. Society and religion might pardon; but for ourselves let that censor be enthroned that cannot pardon such slips from virtue—the censor of our ideal manhood.

A RADICAL DARK LANTERN.

For several months we have exchanged with a queer little Norwegian paper, published in Chicago, with this euphonious title—"Dagslyset. Filosofisk-religiøst Maanedblad udgivet af Marc Thrane." (Conjecturally—"Daylight. A philosophical-religious Monthly Journal, edited by Marc Thrane.") Over this formidable little sheet we pore with as much awe and perplexity as if it were the famous Moabite Stone. We would gladly once in a while translate from its columns, as we fancy we catch now and then in its shady paragraphs the fire-fly glimmer of a radical idea; but Vernon's "Anglo-Saxon Guide," in which we were drearily drilled in our sophomore days, is of little use in this case. It goes out like a lighted match thrust into a jar of carbonic acid gas.

In the unaccountable absence of our Norwegian editor, we can only say that Mr. Thrane is a sympathetic friend, if we can judge by his once sending us a hundred tough names from his own subscription list as those of possible subscribers to THE INDEX. For this evidence of good-will we heartily thank him. But as we never have seen any of their very respectable autographs, we infer that our specimen copies puzzled our Scandinavian friends as severely as the Dagslyset puzzles us. What a pity that Stephen Pearl Andrews has not got his new scientific language fairly launched yet! It would be so convenient if we could sail in his tight little craft, "Alwato," over the great sea of the Curse of Babel!

TRUE AUTHORITY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

I am well satisfied with the idea expressed by W. J. P. in your last issue, purporting that Religion is the recognition of Law proceeding from some source higher than and beyond ourselves. But in respect to every system of Law there is likely to arise some Interpreter of transcendent insight and acumen. If that which the Interpreter declares to be Law commands itself to our highest reason, conscience, and aspiration, he commands our intellectual admiration and deference. If the Interpreter self-sacrificingly lives, and thus practically illustrates the Law which he so well expounds, he commands our reverence and love. And from these sources, I hold, is deduced the authority of Christ as a spiritual guide. To resist such authority, I maintain to be a vain attempt while human nature continues to be as it is. Many depreciate Christ who in their hearts venerate every truth he exhibited. Yet go on, frank, honest INDEX! So far as the incrusting superstitions and errors of Christianity are concerned, I bid your iconoclasm God-speed. I regard the True to be impregnable.

Before closing, let me ideally shake hands with your generous young correspondent, who recently told you, after expressing his general sympathy, that those engaged in his pursuits had only to make money for the purpose of promoting good causes. I would say to the young man—"Macte virtute!" Pray, Mr. A., explain to him my "old foggy" Latin, if necessary. D.

[It is hardly necessary. Our warm-hearted correspondent alluded to evidently understands how to "increase in virtue" in any number of languages.—Ed.]

THE KICK OF THE GUN.

BOSTON, Sept. 7, 1871.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—Ernest Renan, observing the narrowness of the so-called "elect," as every one with open eyes must, says, apologizing for the fact:—"Those whom religion cramps were already small before they connected themselves with it. Narrow and stunted with religion, they would have been positively wicked without it." Who can blame the sceptical or larger part of the world for attributing this narrowness, so often exhibited, to the influence of religion? If I wanted to find narrow, selfish people, I should go to the churches, the more rigid the more certain; if I wanted to find whole-souled people, I should seek them outside, the more liberal the more whole-hearted. I am aware the two classes interpenetrate; but the grand division in this quality is marked, and unmistakable.

The thought herein suggested came to me in full force on reading the letter to you from M. B. Cole, which you have headed "Disgusted." I need not quote the narrowness expressed in this faultily-constructed letter; one picture of it was enough. It is a case where a narrow man has found a narrow niche. He "don't go much on Free Religion;" and more is the pity. The only thing that could widen, elevate, and educate him, would be the teachings of Free Religion. People do not know always what is good for them. It is said a man is either a fool or a physician at forty. It is easily decided which this man is. I do not mean to say a man ought to receive papers filled with ethics or religion disagreeable to him; but there is a more excellent way of signifying preference than Cole's. I know a Christian brother who was also narrow; but he is one who would not have been wicked, if he had not been religious. When I broke the shell, that is, came out of the Baptist church, he pitied me in my departure from the "faith once delivered to the saints," and says, although a score of years have passed since then, that he prays for me. Within a week he has said to me, with that faith born in some people (sure to be disappointed in this case), that my day of rejoicing will come, and I shall return to the church from which I am an apostate. Seeing his motive, I say to him:—"Perhaps so; men become insane, lose their minds; and I may." He often sends me religious papers, &c., and the effect they have on me is to teach me my growth and what narrow thoughts of God and Religion I have escaped from. I should not have written him such a letter as M. B. Cole would; the spelling and the vulgarisms are of no consequence; a Free Religionist would see good if mistaken intentions, and in his action would prove the truer Christian. I mean Christian in its cosmopolitan, not in its sectarian or evangelical sense.

A liberal-minded man was reading the last number of your INDEX in my presence, and before I had done so, as I generally include that in my Sunday's reading, when I can do it thoughtfully. This man saw the letter of Mr. Cole's, and remarked—"What an ugly, stupid man this must be for a Christian! Well, his letter shall do some good. I will send and subscribe to the paper." He did so.

So, brother Abbot, if you have lost this polished Cole from among your well-wishers, you have gained as much on the other side; and I feel sure it will always be so.

Yours truly,
J. WETHERBEE.

FOREIGN MISSIONS.

GENESEO, N. Y., Sept. 2, 1871.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Many thanks to you, Sir, for your pungent answer to the Independent, touching the System of Foreign Missions. Your strictures are in exact accordance with the settled opinions I have long entertained. They remind me of a journey by stage-coach I made many years ago from Albany to Buffalo, in company with an English military officer of great intelligence, who had been stationed during several years at Calcutta, where he had a good opportunity to witness the effect of this deplorable system. He very emphatically expressed the same views of it that you entertain, and he spoke particularly of its degrading effect upon the so-called converts. "They lost caste with their own countrymen, and were by them held and treated with contempt. Being outcasts, they became beggars, and often asked charity of the English, commending themselves, as they imagined, to their favor by saying—"Me good Christian; me eats pork." This enlightened gentleman, accordingly, spoke of the system with utter scorn, denouncing it as you do as "a stupendous fraud upon credulous Christendom." The English author you quote concedes the possibility of there being a few sincere and intelligent Chinese and Burmese converts. This reminded me also of what, if you are as young as I hope you are, you are too young to remember. A quarter of a century ago, a missionary who had been officiating several years in Burmah, and had from time to time made favorable reports of his success, was at length killed, roasted and eaten,—some of his converts, if I mistake not, participating in this ungrateful requital for having "saved their souls." But of course these last must have "fallen from grace." The Chinese authorities, I notice, lately spoke of our orthodox creeds, for it was in these that they had been taught our religion consisted, as our "shameful religion." Is it strange that these arbitrary, senseless dogmas, revolting to the clearest dictates alike of unbiased reason and of conscience, should be thus characterized by rational beings not inured to them from early childhood? Let the Chinese send missionaries to us; we stand quite as much in need of them as they do, for we are as superstitious and benighted as they are. Curiosity, if nothing else, would insure audience to their missionaries; and, while there would be little danger of persuading us to adopt their superstition, I can readily conceive that they might essentially contribute to our emancipation from the thralldom of our own.

Yours respectfully,
ALFRED CONKLING.

REMARKS OF AUGUSTA COOPER BRISTOL AT THE SPIRITUALIST CONVENTION HELD AT LEMPSTER, N. H., AUG. 4TH.

Mr. President, Ladies, and Gentlemen:—

It is the opinion of some Liberalists that Christianity is a principle, not a theory—a moral sentiment, not a creed, and that therefore there may be many a pagan who fills the measure of Christian goodness, though never having heard the name of Jesus. Only in some such way or sense is there found a place for me under the banner of Spiritualism.

Of the phenomena of your faith which appeal to and are recognized by the material sense, I have little or no personal knowledge or experience. I therefore suspend my judgment in regard to the causes of these wonderful phenomena, until I have myself witnessed them; and even then may hold my decision in abeyance, until I am more thoroughly acquainted with psychological and material law.

I am therefore simply an earnest hoper in the doctrines of Spiritualism, and can only appear upon your platform as a Free Religionist, confined to no creed, theory, or organization, and recognizing all theological and spiritual methods as forms of one universal religion, the history of which brightens out of darkness as the centuries move on.

Standing therefore out of all isms, I fancy I am able to compare with a creditable degree of impartiality the different phases of religious belief, and to determine the influence for good or evil which these beliefs exercise upon human character. And first we may rest assured, that no one truth can harm the soul if, when we receive it, we put it in proper relations to other truths. The individual reason, therefore, should be sovereign in the adjustment of truth. Sacrifice that to any authority whatsoever, and we are at sea. The divine reason in every man must decide the trustworthiness of all things presented for its acceptance, whether its source be mundane or spiritual.

I say I am a hoper in the doctrine of Spiritualism. I could not be a hoper in it, if I did not think it a form of belief which, when properly received and realized, insures the largest moral purity to man, and hence the greatest happiness to the race. I find it the only form of belief under the sun which combines in its philosophy and phenomena both intuition and science—the spiritual and material. The Free Religionist appeals to science for the final answer to that question which the anxious heart of Humanity is forever asking—"Is the soul of man immortal?" And should universal Reason decide that Spiritualism yields no affirmation to this interrogation, then the very heart of Man can do no better than return to its old plaintive hymn of hope and faith, and sail into the sunset with all life's patient agony wrought into that song of death.

Again, Spiritualism not only affords its believers a positive future, but a natural one, a future in harmony with our present needs, hopes, desires, aspirations. Why, when I was a little girl, I could not think of going to Heaven without being home-sick and heart-sick, because it was such a Heaven! The other place was fully as congenial to my thought. The best picture which pulpit eloquence could give the fancy was a lonely, unnatural place compared with this green earth. But we might almost say that the Heaven of Spiritualism is a perfected Earth,—its joys deepened, its privileges widened, and its inharmones rounded to peace.

Again, Spiritualism leaves no escape for the soul from its own imperfection and selfishness, except through self-victory. This is its grandest departure from the old theologies. It escapes neither by atoning blood, by death-bed repentance, nor by losing through death the liability to err. On the contrary, death takes not away from us one single human passion or characteristic, but ushers us with all our imperfections into new fields of existence. Our temptations are within us, not without us,—the fever pulses of our own passions. So long, therefore, as selfishness in any form abides within us, so long we shall be tempted; and only through the purification of self-conquest may we hope to vanquish the inward demon. Spiritualism yields no excuse for deferring this battle, since it is unavoidable and must be met sooner or later. Death and eternity offer no vantage-ground of escape. The policy, therefore, of this philosophy is to commence at once the battle against Self. We must inaugurate Heaven here.

Again, Spiritualism is exceptional inasmuch as it makes death enrich, not rob us. Love suffers no loss. The grave takes nothing away from us, only sublimates and refines our dear ones, and leaves them all along our paths and about our homes to comfort, assist, and guard,—the same dear beings we have loved on earth, with all their precious humanity refined to angelhood.

Spiritualism, also, when properly received and realized, must equal or even excel all other forms of religious belief in a restraining moral influence. For we are not always in the presence of an august but invisible assembly, and are not our homes made sacred by angel guests?

Spiritualism, also, if I mistake not, deifies Law; hence the methods of Nature and the phenomena of the universe are worthy of all reverence.

Yet, notwithstanding the advantage which Spiritualism may have over other forms of belief in developing and refining the soul, when properly received and realized, there is no philosophy so detrimental in its moral results, when improperly received and realized. It is therefore a power to be adjusted and regulated. Like the mighty forces of Nature—wind, tide, storm, or electricity—it is the destroyer of man, unless brought under the control of reason.

I could not be faithful to you, my friends, nor to myself, if I failed at this time to criticize as well as applaud your faith; to point out the dangers as well as the safe-guards of your belief. And these dangers are nearly all connected with what are termed Spiritual manifestations. Claiming your forbearance, I will enumerate a few of them as briefly as possible.

And first, you will remember that, in consulting these phenomena, you consult, according to your philosophy, strictly human natures,—under advanced and improved conditions, perhaps; nevertheless you not infrequently lay aside those proper methods of prudence and self-possession which characterize your interviews with friends and strangers upon earth. You yield your confidence and your individuality on a very short acquaintance with a spirit. Now I can see nothing but self-stultification in all this. Why I should seek and follow the advice of an inhabitant of another world, when I would not have taken her or him into my confidence in this world, I cannot understand. Why a spirit-child should be allowed to be our guide in matters which concern the heart-experiences of maturity, I fail to understand. Why we should graciously submit to familiarities from a spirit which we would resent in an earth-friend, I cannot conceive. Why we should allow ourselves to be fettered in a chair, or otherwise bound by spirit-power, when we should be indignant if an earth friend should so attempt to control us, I cannot perceive. You may be sure that the proprieties and amenities of human nature are as obligatory and binding between inhabitants of different worlds, as between those of the same world; and if we are at all anxious, lest earthly friends should meddle with our business, it is certainly inconsistent to yield up the management of our affairs to another, simply because he has thrown off this mortal coil. It is contrary to the essence of your philosophy that you sacrifice the decisions of your reason, even to an intelligence which you may believe to be, on the whole, superior to your own; for such a surrender of your individuality stultifies the development theory, and keeps the soul in the attitude of childhood—the attitude of dependence and irresponsibility. The terrible experiences we encounter because of the mistakes we make in endeavoring "to work out our own salvation," are the obstacles and difficulties that engender power ultimately. Grant that a spirit possesses an intelligence superior to our own; I cannot think it a wise policy to ignore our own inward light, be it ever so faint, and accept the guidance of another. For when shall we possess this superior intelligence as our own attribute? Certainly not until we have earned it by hard effort and stern experience.

You may say that we shall not hold superior intelligence amenable to our conceptions of propriety; but I say unto you that the laws of true courtesy and purity are as eternal and unchangeable as the laws of truth and justice. I will hold God himself amenable to the same laws He imposes upon me.

Do not understand me as saying that the opinions of the disembodied should always be ignored or even held lightly; but I say—subject them to as keen a criticism as you do those of your earth-friends, and accept them on precisely the same terms. This "mountain devil" of authority has always stood between the soul and its best interests. Protestantism fancied it had banished it from its ranks, when it established the freedom and sacredness of private judgment and individual conscience; but it only transferred authority from the Church and a Pope to a Book. Is Spiritualism more consistent if it substitutes another authority more universal and continual than any that has preceded it? Will you rear over the wreck of old theologies a superstition more gigantic than any the ages have yet known?

But this is your danger, not your necessity,—your temptation, not your fate. The inestimable blessing of spirit-communication, if it is a verity, is this, that it settles the question of the soul's future existence, and proves the continuance of its present and best affections. This is enough! Whatsoever is more than this, in my opinion, is fatal to the highest culture of the human soul.

One more criticism, and I have done. "The laws of our being are the laws of God." This, if I mistake not, is the creed or faith of Spiritualism, and the scientific spirit of the age has sealed it with an emphatic amen. There is no profounder scripture than this aphorism, for it is one with Nature and Revelation, yet it is a scripture we may wrest to our destruction. For these laws of God, invested in the human organism, must be set in a certain order that beneficial results may obtain. Every mean, low, selfish impulse is as much of a law as any generous attribute. Is it therefore sacred? Should it therefore be gratified? Are all laws sovereign in the human soul? Must not some be held subject? You may say that all laws of the human organization should have unlimited freedom of action, so long as they do not interfere in such action with the rights and happiness of others. But, my dear friends, are you at liberty to set your own soul in such an order of action as to deteriorate your own quality and power? Are you not a fraction of the great unit of Humanity? Are you not indissolubly bound with the race? How foolish to suppose that you can perform one single individual act, or cherish one single individual thought, that does not involve for good or ill the interests of mankind! There is but one real, actual liberty for any one of us,—liberty to fulfil the highest law of the soul, the law of purity and duty.

Carlyle says there is one strong thing under the sun—the just thing, the true thing! Whosoever, therefore, among you would see your cherished philosophy victorious over all opposing creeds, live justly, truly, purely!

FROM A NEW ENGLAND FARM.

NORTH COLEBROOK, CONN., July 26, 1871.

MR EDITOR:—Having been a subscriber and reader of THE INDEX since the commencement of the first volume, I feel a wish to submit a few thoughts for your consideration. Although a farmer, I have spent some time in the examination of the subject of religion, and have tried to reconcile Unitarian sentiments with infinite wisdom, goodness, and power. But I find the problem is beyond my ability. I have never found an orthodox man that could reconcile the doctrine of endless punishment with infinite goodness.

I am glad that THE INDEX is published. I hope it will have a wide circulation, and open the eyes of those that are in orthodox darkness. I cannot find that the Pagans ever had any wars on account of their religion; but since the introduction of the Christian religion more than sixty millions of human beings have been put to death because they did not believe right, and some of them in the most excruciating manner that malice could invent. At last Thomas Jefferson proclaimed to the world that a man's belief is a very harmless thing, neither breaks our legs nor picks our pockets. Sir, I have no fears of an orthodox hell, nor have I any veneration for an orthodox God.

IRA SMITH.

An "advanced thinker" is described as a creature with long hair, cadaverous face, peaked features, short pants, badly bagged at the knee, liberal supply of dandruff and loose hair on his coat-collar, nasal voice, his liver and digestive organs out of order, wears spectacles, is heavy on progress, sound on the goose, and generally delivers fall and winter lectures. He is, of course, very radical.—Zion's Herald. [But for the Herald's placard, we should have taken him at first sight for a Methodist.—Ed.]

INDEX TRACTS

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION have published the following tracts, and will publish others of a similar character, if encouraged to do so by the receipt of enough orders to cover the expense:—

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no abler, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Fifteen copies One Dollar.

Also, the scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition by PARKER PILLSBURY, entitled "The Sunday Question," is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

Friends of Free Religion wishing to assist the publication of such tracts as these will please donate such sums as they think proper, which will be applied exclusively to this purpose. Address—

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Circulars with list of subjects will be sent on application.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

THE WORK IN HAND.

[The substance of an address to the First Independent Society of Toledo, Sept. 10, 1871.]

At the beginning of this third year of my work among you, my friends, it is well to take a fresh survey of our own objects and aims, and thus enter upon our common task with a clearer conception of its nature,—I trust, also, with a more earnest devotion to it. That you consider it to be of great importance, I cannot but conclude from the manner in which you have met and conquered the peculiar difficulties of the past year, and the spirit with which you have made the necessary sacrifices in order to keep our flag flying at the mast-head. All things considered, we begin the new year under cheerful auspices, and with a far better prospect of continuance than that before us a year ago. Still to exist as an organized society is of itself a battle won, since every year increases the constituency we represent, and adds to the influence of the principles we advocate. Without pausing to rehearse what is familiar to you all, I will at once enter on my subject.

What is the work we have to do?

First of all let me mention what it is not. This will clear the ground of some old rubbish and prevent any embarrassment from notions that belong to a past epoch. So great is the contrast between Christianity and Free Religion, so dissimilar are their principles and objects, that it becomes necessary not to evade the duty of admitting that contrast in all its force,—not to fall into the weakness of trying to smooth it over for the sake of saving popularity or sparing over-sensitive nerves. I am tired of the looseness of thought—I had almost said looseness of morals—which betrays too many liberals into hurtful concessions to the dominant religious system, and makes them bewilder the public mind by attempts to force Christian phraseology into the service of radical ideas. Names and catch-words have enormous influence over ordinary minds. To suppose otherwise is to be ignorant of human nature. Whoever thinks it easier to insinuate a new idea under cover of old and familiar terms than it is to promulgate it openly in language free from misleading associations, fails to appreciate the tenacity with which old thoughts stick to old words. You may define the old words as much as you please, giving new senses in different language as their equivalents; but common minds cannot escape that mighty power of suggestion by which the old senses are irresistibly called back by the familiar sounds. The time has come when calling a spade a spade is essential to success in the kind of agriculture we are undertaking.

Our Independent Society is not a Christian church, nor a church in any sense that is intelligible by common people. We do not call ourselves by that name; and we frankly recognize the vast chasm that separates our work from the work of the churches. Our faces are turned in a different direction. Our hands are busied with other tasks. Our feet tread other paths. Our thoughts run in other channels. Our hopes aspire to other objects. In a word, we are not a church, and take no interest in the work of the churches, except to oppose it. So far as the churches exert an influence in favor of good morals and manners and the true amelioration of society here on earth, we heartily wish them well; but this is not the end for which churches exist or were originally called into existence, and it does not constitute the true work of the churches. Just so far as the churches are faithful to their own professed creeds, their work is hostile to ours, and our work is hostile to theirs. They themselves instinctively recognize this antagonism, and, if they only had the power as in olden times, they would speedily put us out of the way—by the dungeon or the scaffold. We, however, rely solely on the power of ideas as weapons; and while uncompromisingly using the sword of truth, we should disdain all appeal to the sword of steel, except in self-defence. The antagonism we admit, be it remembered, involves necessarily no hatred, no bad blood; it is simply an antagonism of principles and objects, aspirations and ideas. Our method of warfare is to educate, not to gag—to convince minds, not to punch heads; and the spirit of our warfare should be, and I trust is, that of devotion to humanity, not zeal for a sect or an organization.

In a general sense, then, I admit unqualifiedly that antagonism between Christianity and Free Religion which the churches perfectly well perceive, and which only radicals who are more sympathetic than sagacious deny. To make the difference between our work and the work of the churches still plainer, however, let me state it a little more in detail:

1. Our work is not to "save souls" from any literal or allegorical hell in a future life. But this is the great end and aim of all Christian churches, except only an insignificant squad of demoralized congregations calling themselves "Liberal Christians," which, having crawled half through a hole in the fence and got stuck by the middle, fancy themselves still within the fold and safe from the prowling wolf of Free Religion; although the wolf has nothing to do but to snap off their pilloried heads at his leisure. The "salvation of souls" from dangers that have no more real existence than the frightful shapes of a nightmare-dream, and that have pretty much the same origin—indigestion—is no part of our work. It is terrified fanaticism alone that busies itself with such objects. We have better business to attend to. To make the most of human life here and now, to enrich it and enlarge it and beautify it and hallow it by the pursuit of truth, virtue, and the universal happiness of mankind, is an object so worthy of the devotion of rational beings, that it commands respect and arouses enthusiasm in the exact proportion that the world becomes truly civilized. Whatever lies beyond this life lies beyond its active interests,—not beyond its wonder, its hope, its awed conjectures and poetic dreams, yet certainly beyond the sphere of its present motives. The work that commands our energies to-day concerns the duties and occupations of to-day; and if we make to-day right, the morrow cannot be wrong. How vast and bottomless the abyss, then, that yawns between our work and that of the churches! Leave to them all visionary anxiety about that unknown future,—act in the living present.

2. Neither is it our work as a society to maintain the "stated public worship" of God—at least as an act of duty owed by us to him. I cannot recognize the obligation to worship him in the manner of the churches. They conceive public praise and prayer to be an act of homage required by his glory, and imposed upon the human conscience as the most serious and solemn of all human duties. Not thus can I regard it. If men and women are drawn together by sympathy in the highest and purest sentiments of their common nature,—if, when thus assembled, it seems a natural and spontaneous thing to pour out the struggling aspirations of the soul in audible speech, addressed to the eternal THOU we dimly apprehend as in some sort their fitting goal,—it is beautiful and well. But the freedom of worship makes all its worth, and forbids the trammels of set appointment. More and more do I feel that our truest worship is something that shuns publicity and parade—something that ill harmonizes with the mixed sentiments of a crowd—something that gushes out of the deepest communings with the spirit of universal Nature, and that rarely stirs in the cold and critical presence of unsympathetic minds. It is not our work to maintain "stated public worship." If the spirit of prayer descends on us all together, and makes itself felt as a common impulse, then surely it is as natural that this feeling should be breathed into audible words as that our common thought should be so expressed. But it would be fatal to subject to rigid rule the fitful activity of the religious sentiment. Worship, as such, must be incidental in our meetings, not a regular routine. It is not our work. That larger and deeper and higher worship which consists in constant self-consecration to goodness, beneficence, and truth, and which should be but another name for our entire lives, cannot be compressed into an hour—cannot find its best expression in any words, but rather in daily integrity and deeds of active duty. In this more comprehensive sense of the word worship, it may indeed be said that worship is our work. But it will be then our work as individual men and women rather than as a society; for this organization of ours is but one and the least of all means for doing the work of our private lives. We have associated ourselves for the purpose of better fulfilling certain common obligations; but these obligations are neither made nor intensified by our association. They are rooted in our nature as human beings, and have created, instead of being created by, our society. True, our activity as a society must be part and parcel of our general activity, and, if this be worship, must itself be worship also. But "public worship," as commonly understood, is not our work. It is a large part of church-work, but not of ours. Our ends are practical and humanitarian, and only in that sense religious. If worship enters into our meetings as an element, it will be only as an incidental, spontaneous expression of our higher humanity quickened into free activity—not as an act of homage exacted by divine command.

3. Still less is it our work to maintain an institution for the indulgence of a luxurious and refined sentimentality. Those Christian churches which have nearly got rid of their Christianity,—which discard the general Christian system of belief and yet have not got beyond the habit of Christian observances,—make their pulpits not infrequently a place for the retailing of religious molasses-and-water. Too heretical for the earnest inculcation of thorough-going orthodoxy and yet too timid for fearless grappling with living questions of the day, the preachers fall back on gentle, smooth-phrased homilies designed to touch the emotions and to create a general sensation of goodness. This is Christianity of the sentimental school—Christianity that reminds me of the old lady in "Phœnixiana" who went to a dentist to have her tooth extracted. The dentist tugged and pulled, and finally extracted, not only the tooth, but the entire skeleton besides; and he was forced to carry the old lady home in a bag, a mere mass of pulp. To a similar condition of bonelessness does Unitarianism reduce Christianity. Its churches accordingly too often become crying-schools for romantic young misses and lady-like young men. Instead of strong Christian doctrine or strong secular good sense, they administer a diet of soft platitudes as the bread of life, and make capital out of a morbid religiosity. You may be sure I have no wish to go and do likewise. It is no part of my work, at least, to ladle out pap. Far be it from me to despise earnest feeling, or to pour contempt on the finer religious sensibilities. But the worst enemy of sentiment is sentimentality. Unless vigorous thought on important topics can be supplied from this platform, it would be far better to spend our Sunday evenings at home with a fine book or a genial friend. Let us never mistake eye-water for religion. My appeals are made to your heads, not to your handkerchiefs. I aim to give you food for reflection, and to reach your hearts only through your minds. To be sure, this is not a wise course altogether, so far as popularity or large audiences are concerned. Most people regard him as the finest and most eloquent preacher who can make them "laugh and cry by turns." But I covet no influence of that sort. It is that part of our common work which you have delegated to me, to furnish the best thoughts I can attain on subjects of real and high importance. Our meetings are not to be crying-schools, but thinking-schools. No "come to Jesus!" eloquence is to be here expected,—no mellifluous periods redolent of cologne and Phalon. But I shall use my best endeavors to put my strongest convictions into straightforward speech, and take it for granted that this will please you better, and be productive of far more profit, than if I were to sing you a bewitching syren-song that is nothing but meaningless sound at last. To the evangelical churches let us resign the dry husks of orthodoxy, and to the "Liberal Christian" churches let us grant a monopoly of milk-and-water heterodoxy.

In short, our Independent Society is not a church. It aims neither to "save souls," nor to maintain "stated public worship," nor to sugar-coat moralisms with a film of Christian sentimentality. These things are no part of its work.

On the contrary, our Society is a company of men and women who are deeply imbued with the spirit of a purely humanitarian religion,—though the word "religious" is no part of its adopted designation. I will now state what I conceive its legitimate work is, having at considerable length stated what it is not. What I have said, however, in some measure anticipates what I have still to say.

1. Our work embraces individual culture. By this I mean the cultivation of everything that shall make us finer individuals. Charity begins at home. So does religion. The expansion, strengthening, rectification, in one word the culture, of our natural capacities and powers is one great object of our work, and our meetings must have this object constantly in view. You come to hear what I have to say, because you credit me beforehand with having something to say that is worth hearing. I hope I shall not disappoint this reasonable expectation. But the object of your listening is to enlarge your own mental horizon, by taking whatever truth comes to you freshly in this way, and incorporating it into the body of convictions by which you govern your own lives. What ever seems mistaken in any utterances of mine, you of course reject. No one of you comes here, as the people go to the churches, to hear the "word of God expounded." Your purpose is individual culture—the clarification of your opinions by thought, the education of your reflective powers by exercise, the cultivation of discriminative intelligence by a careful testing of what you hear. Such, at least I hope, is your purpose, though not the whole of it. For I earnestly trust that the strengthening of your intellectual nature in this manner will involve also an equal strengthening of your moral and spiritual nature. This depends upon yourselves. I appeal to your whole nature, through the medium of your conscious thought. Our culture should be integral, not one-sided; and a man whose intellectual outruns his moral development is a monstrosity.

2. Our work must also embrace social as well as individual culture. We are members of a complex organism called society, on the healthful activity of whose various parts our own individual welfare largely depends. Instead, therefore, of limiting our interests to ourselves, they must embrace those of others,—in fact of all others, but especially of those who are most closely connected with us. We need to cultivate more than we have done the kindly feelings that flow from constant intercourse with each other, and thus secure the warmth of new interest in our common objects, which can come in no other way. Embers scattered over a hearth speedily go out; raked together, they burst into a blaze. An old simile, but a good one. I hope we shall secure far greater freedom of intercourse among ourselves this year than we have ever had before.

3. But I am the last man in the world to be satisfied with a mere busy humming in our own little hive. Our society has larger relations than to itself. It is under a high obligation to make itself felt more than ever in the community at large. It ought to be a powerful centre of educational influences in the direction of all liberal ideas. This it is now in no small degree. But you do not dream yet of the power you might exert, which should be measured, not by our numbers (for we are indeed few), but by the weight of our ideas. United, vigorous action, even by a few determined persons, is capable almost of working miracles—certainly of working what will seem miracles to lookers-on. If we choose, we can far more than ever before stimulate to activity the dormant forces of social progress in this place. I trust we shall not let slip our great opportunities. Let us have faith in ourselves.

4. But not only ought we to aim to exert a powerful influence over the public opinion of this community—we ought also to set it a lesson not to be ignored by practising ourselves what we preach. Our Society should be a starting-point for all good enterprises. It should be our great ambition to accomplish as much as possible in the way of originating and getting under headway practical projects that shall benefit the public. I am proud to congratulate you now on the finally assured success of the evening schools for both sexes. Two years ago a few of us, notwithstanding the misgivings of others, determined to start an evening school for men and boys, sure that such an experiment could not fail, if once fairly begun. With many discouragements, you triumphed over all obstacles, and during the winter, with a little outside assistance, kept the school in prosperous condition. The next winter the School Board of the city promptly and generously responded to our request, and conducted the schools very successfully by volunteer teachers. This year I am assured the Board will make the Evening Schools a part of the regular school system, to be conducted by paid teachers, like the rest. This happy result of an experiment so greatly needed, and entered upon by you with a faith sufficient to dispel all timorous doubts, should embolden us for similar work hereafter. It only takes equal devotion to secure the success of other equally important enterprises. Let me name one that demands immediate attention.

Toledo has no free public library. She has a public library small in extent, open only six days in the week, to which a fee of three dollars a year must be paid as the price of admission. It does not belong to the city, but to the Toledo Library Association, which is in debt. The city has refused to accept the gift of their library until the debt is paid. It is a shame and disgrace to Toledo that she should not possess a library open all the week, Sundays included, without money and without price. The class that most needs its advantages are precisely those to whom three dollars are an important sum, hard to be spared from daily necessities. A dozen determined men could in one year from this day secure the establishment of a free city library, at least in germ; but nobody moves in the matter. Cannot these dozen men be found in our society? What worthier object could command our efforts? Education—the education of the people—is the means that Free Religion must rely upon to bring about a nobler and purer state of society. I hope that we shall be able and willing to take hold of this enterprise as devotedly and successfully as we took hold of the Evening Schools. I commend it to your especial attention, and will do all in my power to help any plan that may be desired to secure the object aimed at.

This, then, is the work of the year—individual culture, social culture, the enlargement of our public influence, the origination of useful public enterprises that have no connection with our private or society interests. It is a work worthy to command a noble enthusiasm and our most persistent efforts. If we are faithful to it, we shall have worshipped God in the highest and best sense of the word; for there is no worship comparable with that of daily duty and unselfish toil.

An English magazine recently published an account of the wreck of the ship Britannia, which struck on the rocks off the coast of Brazil. She was freighted in part with Spanish coin, packed in barrels. At first the crew hoped to save these, and hoisted them up from the hold on deck; but it soon became evident that the ship was fast sinking, and they were obliged to take to the boats. Just as the last boat was pushing off, a young midshipman rushed back to make sure that no one was left by accident to perish. He found a sailor seated flat on the deck, with a hatchet in his hand, several barrels broken open, and the other hand plunged to the elbow in a heap of gold. "What are you doing?" shouted the midshipman. "Escape for your life! Don't you know the ship is going to pieces?" "The ship may," retorted he; "I have lived a poor wretch all my life, and I am determined to die rich." Remonstrances were vain. The midshipman fled to the vessel's side, but turned and cried once more—"I tell you the ship can't hold together another moment. Quick! You can yet be saved!" "Not without leaving my gold!" roared the sailor, with a wild glare in his eye; "go your ways!" In a few moments the great black waves of the ocean were rolling over the rich sailor and his riches.

Friends, thousands of men every day repeat the madman's folly. Caring little for their principles, their moral life, they sacrifice all to gain. Not so may it be with us! At any and every cost, let us be true to our principles, do our work, and refuse to go down with our gold!

A SHARP ENCOUNTER.

[By an English missionary in the Shanghai (China) Evening Courier, of June 30, 1871.]

My duties led me on a certain evening not very long ago to the Missionary Chapel, which it is my custom to open on the week day for the benefit of those who may be desirous of hearing the Gospel. I had scarcely entered and taken my seat, before a Chinaman came in, and with a cool and business-like air at once took a seat on one of the empty benches. Usually before the preaching has well commenced, those who do stroll in do so in a lounging, easy, indifferent kind of way, as though curiosity were the only possible motive that could have brought them in. This man, however, seemed as though he had come by special appointment, and it were a matter of supreme importance that the subject in hand should be finished off as quickly as possible. It would have been difficult to say from the man's appearance to what position in life he belonged. His dress bordered on the shabby, and the style of the man seemed to indicate that he was more familiar with the artisan class than with any other. His face, however, had a peculiar look of sharpness and intelligence, such as one is more accustomed to meet with among the more educated. His conversation, too, was interlarded with book phrases, and his general knowledge of his own literature was so very extensive that it was evident his dress gave no proper clew to his status in society. The more I looked at the man, the more was I struck with his general appearance. There was intelligence; there was combined with it a certain look of dissatisfaction. He seemed like a man whose ambition had soared high, but whose projects had all failed, and consequently the disappointment that failure had produced had become stamped upon his expression.

After a few common-place remarks, in which he had said that this was the first time he had ever been in a missionary chapel—which statement, however, I mentally declared to be untrue—we turned to the subject of religion. At first he tried to defend idolatry as a thing introduced and organized by the sages in older times, and that therefore the ceremonies in connection with it were binding upon the whole Chinese nation. He referred to the classics in confirmation of what he said, but, upon a closer investigation of the texts quoted, he had to acknowledge that his interpretation of them differed very materially from those of the recognized commentators. Indeed he finally agreed that it was not till so late as the Han dynasty, which was very considerably later than Confucius, that idolatry began to be the fairly recognized medium of worship in China.

Turning from this point, he said:—"Very good, I grant you there is nothing very strong that can be said in defence of idolatry; but," he continued, "we have our sages with all the writings they have transmitted to us. They contain doctrines of the highest and purest character, and it is these that after all are the real powers in our nation's morals. It seems to come to this. You have the doctrines of your sages, and we have ours. Why not rest content with what we mutually possess, instead of your striving to induce us to lay aside ours and believe in yours?"

I agreed with him that, if it was simply a question of differing sages, there was no use in our coming to China to interfere with the systems they possessed. The case, however, was very different from that: the real question at issue was one between the doctrines of the Bible and the doctrines propounded by man—whether in fact God was to be the teacher of the world or man. I, however, demurred to his statement that the doctrines of the sages, in their highest and purest aspect, had any appreciable influence at the present time in leading the nation to do what is right. I challenged him to produce me one instance either from among the literati or the mandarin class, who are the most thoroughly imbued of any of the Chinese in these doctrines, who was in any degree striving to carry out the principles they contain.

He somewhat hesitatingly agreed that the instances were certainly very rare. Whilst in the very act of admitting this, the easy manner he had hitherto assumed in his conversation with me seemed to slide from the man, and like a flash of lightning a look of suppressed hatred and bitterness spread over his face instead. "Oh! then," he said, "your object in coming here is to teach us charity and benevolence and truth and uprightness, is it?" I said—"Yes." "If this be your object, then, why is it that you yourselves act in a spirit so directly the reverse of these, and force upon us instead your abominable opium? If your nation believes in these doctrines as divine, why has it imported this poisonous stuff to bring poverty and distress and ruin throughout our land?" And as he went on, he became excited and his eye flashed, and his eloquence grew. Chinaman-like, he rolled his head from side to side, whilst the congregation (which in the meantime had grown largely) looked on with approving sympathy.

I was so utterly taken aback that I could do nothing but quietly sit still, until he had given full expression to his feelings. My surprise arose not so much from the matter as the manner of his accusation. It was given forth in the most offensive language, and with a force such as I had never met with on any previous occasion. After he had finished what he had to say, the congregation that was scattered about—some sitting on the forms, others leaning by the doorway, and others again bending over the back of the seats listening breathlessly to what the man was saying—with one consent turned their faces toward me, waiting without uttering a sound to hear what would be my reply. I must say that I never felt so uncomfortable in my life before. What the man had said I knew and felt to be the truth. I began therefore somewhat stammeringly to say something in self-defence, when the man at once stopped me by saying:—"There is no use in your trying to get out of the matter by saying that you have nothing to do with this opium system. Your country has. It is your nation, England, that is responsible for all this ruin, caused by opium. It was the English guns that compelled our Emperor to sanction the trade, and it is through England that it may now be sold throughout the length and breadth of the land without our government being able to do anything effectual to prevent its spread throughout the kingdom."

The facts of the case were all on his side, though somewhat offensively stated. England's share in this opium question is one which no reasoning and no sophistry can turn to her honor. Whatever of greatness or of glory there may be in her history to which she can point with satisfaction, there is at least one blot upon her escutcheon which will not be easily effaced, and that is that she was the direct means of stimulating and protecting a trade that involves a third of the human race in evils which no language can describe. I replied that, as far as regarded the opium itself, he and I were at one. If he condemned it, just as strongly did I; but I reminded him that, if the Chinese would only cease from buying, the foreigners must of necessity stop from importing—an argument that seemed to have such weight with him that it completely silenced him, though to myself it appeared so utterly illogical that I was heartily ashamed for having to use it. But a drowning man will catch even at a straw.

Taking advantage of the turn affairs had taken, I glided off into another subject and had been speaking for ten minutes or so, the man all the while listening most attentively, when something in my remarks again seemed to strike him, so he stopped me and said:—"It is not simply by your forcing your opium upon us that you manifest your hatred of us. You foreigners don't seem to be able to understand that we Chinese have any natural affection. You come amongst us and you separate husband from wife and children from parents, and you break up the family relationships, and you leave many a family in mourning and misery." I was utterly astonished at this charge, not having the remotest idea at what he was driving. I endeavored to stop him for an explanation, but his indignation was again hurrying him along at a pace it was impossible to control. At last at one of his breathing-spots I managed to make him hear that he must stop, for I could not allow him to go on. "Oh indeed! You insist that I shall stop, do you? You think you can come here to teach us, and the moment we begin to speak of the wrongs your country has done us, our mouths must be stopped! Pretty teacher of morals you are, indeed!" I assured him I did not understand his charge, and that I stopped him simply to get an explanation, not to silence him. My custom in the chapel had ever been to allow all fair discussion, and he had but to explain himself to get a fair and honest hearing. A few words from him enabled me to perceive that he referred to the coolie traffic which some years ago had been carried on in this place. Of the iniquities of this traffic in its earlier stage it would be impossible to speak in strong enough terms. Many a home had indeed been made desolate—many a family had been bereaved by the man-stealer, and throughout this region the connection of the foreigner with it had engendered a feeling which is even now only beginning to subside. Indeed, only a week previously I had seen the lifeless trunk of a man carried past me who had been beheaded an hour before for decoying persons away to be shipped in the South as coolies.

Fortunately his accusation was stronger than the present state of the case would sanction, and I proceeded to show him that the evils he described did not exist now. The English government had made such arrangements for emigration that not only must a man's consent be obtained for his going abroad to an English colony, but also that the agreement entered into with him by English subjects must be faithfully observed to the very letter.

After sitting a few minutes longer, he rose from his seat and left the Chapel.

The above is a brief description of a scene of which I have a very vivid, but at the same time a very painful recollection. Of course I have given the substance of his remarks in my own words. To have reproduced his exact language would have been both impossible and indiscreet. As I have already hinted, he spoke in the most offensive way. He did not stay to choose his words, and what he did say was of so strong and pungent a nature that, accustomed as I am to every variety of Chinese character, I had never met with any one that had his ability to say things in such a bitter and sarcastic way.

It is often suggested that, if any attempt be made to elevate the Chinese nation, it must be first done through the medium of civilization—that commerce ought first to lead the way, and after a while, when the native mind has been in some degree prepared for it, Christianity might step in, and, gathering up the scattered threads that civilization had been weaving, unite them all into one perfect whole. Now the audience that was gathered around me had come within the influence of two things that had followed in the wake of trade, namely, opium and the coolie trade. They had seen the effect of both in this immediate neighborhood, and the only result that had been produced by them was still deeper hatred of the foreigners, and an additional argument for rejecting the Christianity that was associated with them. The comparatively slow progress of Christianity in some parts of China is often pointed out and commented on by those who believe in first civilizing the Chinese—all the while apparently unconscious that this is in a great measure owing to the state of feeling produced by the very questionable nature of at least one article that unhappily constitutes a prominent feature in the commerce of to-day. The grievances that the Chinaman has against the foreigner are not all ideal ones—not all the result of his intense conservatism. The Chinaman is shrewd enough to observe that, whatever blessings the foreigner may bring with him, he is the cause of evils which in their present power for mischief overshadow all the effects that his good could possibly achieve. There is no one that looks upon the frightful net-work of opium shops that is spread throughout any Chinese city one visits, or that marks the fearful results in the thousands of pale and emaciated wretches that one may see issuing from these dens by day or night, but that must feel this. It is time that the nations of the west should learn—and in this particular matter of opium, England most of all,—that a true regard for their national honor, but, most of all, for their Christianity, imperatively demands that no commerce shall be deemed lawful that shall involve any nation, even though that be a heathen one, in wide-spread ruin and distress.

FREE RELIGION MATURING.

[From the Morning Star, Dover, N. H.]

Free Religion began by protesting against any authoritative interpretation of Christ's words and claims. It has proceeded by doubting whether Christ really said many things that are attributed to him by the evangelists; then, by questioning whether many things that he did say are really true; then, by denying his authority over men as a teacher; then, by accusing him of mental blunders and moral defects, till at length it scouts him openly as an offence to the head and heart of true men,—“an ignorant youngster” and “a mad fanatic.” One hardly sees how it is to take any added steps in the downward way of passionate hatred and indecent blasphemy.

Mr. E. C. Towne, editor of The Examiner, published in Chicago, is showing us the real spirit and the natural outcome of this new and bad type of unbelief which seeks to cover itself with the mantle of religion worn as a name. He has heretofore acted directly with such men as Messrs. Frothingham and Abbot; the chief reason why he does not really and fully act with them now, is found in the fact that he is “progressing” a little too fast for their more cautious and hesitating steps. They still count each other as allies. Each praises the other for his active hostility to Christianity, even while criticising him for excess of rashness or a too timid conservatism. Having an ardent temperament and a fervid life, Mr. Towne brings Free Religion to the bitter fruit and the repulsive seed, while cooler natures have only shown us the promising bud or hung out the attractive blossom. The same or similar results are likely to appear sooner or later wherever the plant takes root and finds toleration and nurture.

It is well that these ultimate products show themselves thus early. They will open some eyes and return a plain answer to not a few earnest questions. They will remove the taking mask and show the hideous features it has covered. It will be strange if more or less persons do not find themselves arrested, startled and turned back from a road which is seen leading to such a goal. And so, seeing that the bad blood is in Mr. Towne, it is well that it comes to the surface as an exponent of the moral malady within. Vice, when seen in its naked hideousness, repels instead of winning, as the druikards driven through the streets of Sparta taught the young men sobriety. And so these exhibitions of Free Religion, full-grown, audacious, mad, bitter and revengeful, may work for the profit of the truth, and lift up a warning that will be heard and heeded.

The Examiner abounds in the bold, bad style, which fittingly sets off the somewhat shocking substance behind it. Every issue seems meant to make an advance in its irreligion upon that which preceded it, and to pave the way for something still more shocking. But the editor has said few things more plain and unequivocal than those which appear in a note lately sent to the editor of the Golden Age, remonstrating with him for saying that he (Mr. Towne), in venting his spite upon Jesus, was “trying to write down the greatest of characters and blacken the holiest of human names with suspicion.” He denies the charge, not by saying that he honors Jesus, but by asserting that there is nothing in him that deserves honor, but much if not everything to call for contempt and execration. To show that we do him no injustice, we copy his own words. They are pitiable and shocking enough, most certainly, and few can read them without pain; but the warning which they carry and the protest which they will call out may make them indirectly serviceable. They are the words of a representative man, and not of a mere individual iconoclast; they set forth the drift of a public movement, and not the mere erratic flight of a strange human comet in the theological heavens. Here are the words he writes:—

“What do you mean? What your words mean is, that I, seeing greatness and holiness in Jesus, have borne lying witness against him. But I see nothing of the kind in Jesus; consequently I have not tried to write down, nor to blacken. I have honestly stated the facts as I have seen them. Can not you do me the justice to recognize this? Not only have I not tried to write down, but I have tried to restrain my feelings of theistic and humane indignation, and to state plain facts without passion.

And my feelings you entirely mistake. Personally I do not care a fig what becomes of the name of Jesus. And rough as my encounter with accredited Christianity is, I can not doubt that we already begin to see the end of that intolerable humbug, an ignorant youngster put forward as the impersonation of greatness and holiness, and a mad fanatic thrust between God and His children, to cut off grace from heaven except at his own will, and to put hate for kindness between man and man wherever his claim may be denied.”

That is surely bold enough for the French Atheists and bitter enough for Thomas Paine. Mr. Towne seems to us more logical and self-consistent than his more cautious and ambiguous brethren. He does not mince matters. He strikes at the root. He will have no image which is part iron and part clay. His Jesus must be no myth or embodied ideal,—no mixture of the inspired genius and the bigoted Jew,—no compound of the prophet and politician,—no product resulting from the multiplication of the rounded saint by the headlong reformer. Mr. Towne sees that he must either be accepted as the divine Messiah and the Lord of mankind, or spurned as the great impostor and charlatan of history, whose baseless pretensions the world has already put up with quite too long. And so, denying him the one character, he proceeds in his effort to cover him with the odium which attaches to the other.

It is well to make the character and claims of Christ the key of the position and the culminating point in the struggle. The old question, “What think ye of Christ?” is well brought forward as the great question of to-day. He is still “the sign that should be spoken against.” His own statement is yet true,—“They hated me without a cause.” Just as in the first century, so in the nineteenth, he is “set for the fall and rising again of many in Israel.” Let the contest go on at this vital point. We ourselves could choose no better one. Mr. Frothingham may keep on with his guarded criticism, and Mr. Towne may multiply his bitter and passionate epithets. He who wore the mock robe in which Herod arrayed him, and carried the cross which the brutal populace laid upon his shoulder, bearing both calmly to the height where he wrought out his work as Redeemer of men, will take these later indignities, without faltering, to the throne which he is to occupy as King of kings and Lord of lords. “For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet.”

“The prisoner has a very smooth countenance.” “Yes; he was ironed just before he was brought in. That accounts for it.”—National Baptist.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—“Popular errors on all subjects are numerous; but I know of no error that is so thoroughly rooted in the public mind as the idea that Christianity is the author of modern civilization. But it is easy to see how this ignorance has obtained; the report of a battle is always colored by the partizanship of the reporter. What is chronicled by the victor as a ‘great victory,’ may be reported by the vanquished as a ‘change of base.’ For the same reason, the literature of every country always magnifies its own people; its own customs, its own institutions, both political and religious; and since literature has hitherto been controlled by persons having great reverence for Christianity as an institution, it has fallen into the habit of adulation, and has not allowed the public mind to see that anything good could come ‘out of Nazareth.’ Hence I welcome the article headed ‘Christianity and Civilization’ in No. 56 of THE INDEX. Many will doubtless say that this popular error is harmless, and not worth the trouble of dissipating. But it is axiomatic with me that all error is injurious, and I feel compelled to combat against it, without caring to specify how it is injurious in any particular case, though the sequel never fails to reveal numerous ways. For is not truth light?—and is not error darkness?—and is there no harm done by shrouding in darkness that most magnificent of all God’s works, the human mind? Success to THE INDEX.”

—“THE INDEX in all respects does not meet my ideal. While I cheerfully accord to it merit and ability, especially your own articles, I cannot say that it meets my wants. There are many good things in your little sheet. And there are many things in it that almost make me tremble as I read them. What some of your correspondents may choose to say on the subject of Christianity, I don’t care so much about; for many of them, I fear, are cold blooded deists and atheists, and are literary desperadoes, fearing nothing. But I don’t like to hear you calling ‘Christianity a religion of barbarism’ and one of ‘despair.’ For you to make such remarks sounds so unnatural that it shocks me. Your paper contains Light without Heat. The able and brilliant articles and writings of Mr. O. B. Frothingham have the light of the stars—cold but no warmth. I did at one time think that the mantle of Theo. Parker had fallen on him, but I think now that I was mistaken. That great and noble man had Heat as well as Light. You will excuse the liberty I take of writing to you as I have done. But sometimes the question will arise in my mind—will the reading of such writings leave a man better than they found him? That is the one great question.”

—“I am very happy you have got well established and vindicated a chance to be heard. I can’t say I accept your position, or quite like your tone—but I am glad to have you or any man say his say. I have long wanted to suggest that a more calm or philosophical manner would advance the scientific study of Religion more than that which (if you will permit me to say it) seems to me to have characterized THE INDEX. I think you have given to the movement of free religion a partisan aspect, which is to be regretted—I think you err in accrediting to it definite forms of interpretation (i. e. doctrines, &c.) and forget that Religion, when free, covers Christianity, Romanism, Paganism, as well as Abbotism. No individual man is its prophet—or has a right to draw article or creed for it.”

—“You go on bravely with your Index Association Stock Co. The West should be to you what Chicago is to Collyer and Brooklyn to Beecher. There are thousands who would not be without THE INDEX one week, could they once be induced to subscribe. Millions are hungering and thirsting for its truths. I know it is so from what I see. I wish I could induce every subscriber you now have to obtain another, and then they another each, and onward all the year round. The paper deserves it. The people need it.”

POPULARIZING SCIENCE.

There is no more hopeful or important sign of the times than the growing popularity of books designed to interest the general public in scientific discoveries and pursuits by presenting them in an attractive literary garb. The modern scientific man finds that he cannot do any work for which his fellow-men are more grateful, or more willing to pay, than that which consists in taking, as it were, the public into his private laboratory or observatory, and explaining without needless technicalities the general method of his researches. Hardly is the novel itself found to be more remunerative to publishers than the book intended to popularize science. Instruction thus given is, of course, neither systematic nor profound; but it may be exact as far as it goes. It gives only a smattering of knowledge, and is, in fact, designed only to create an appetite for it. Without at all superseding the works of a more elaborate character, it nevertheless gives the ordinary reader some notion of scientific results, and, above all, of its methods of investigation and reasoning. The moral good thus done is incalculable. Superstition is quietly sapped and undermined, without being directly attacked. Old weeds are cut under; the ground is prepared for the sowing of seed that is destined to yield by and by a rich harvest of social ameliorations.

Such books, for instance, as Sir John Herschel's "Familiar Lectures on Scientific Subjects,"—Huxley's "Lay Sermons and Addresses," "Origin of Species," and "Evidence as to Man's Place in Nature,"—Lesley's "Origin and Destiny of Man,"—Figuier's "Primitive Man,"—Guillemain's "Heavens," etc., etc., are disseminating a taste for scientific thought and a popular appreciation of the scientific spirit that must work notable results in the next generation. It becomes harder and harder for the promulgators of antiquated follies to find a sympathetic audience,—not so much because these have become intolerably stupid and dull. Our forefathers swallowed pecks and bushels of nonsense simply because there was a lack of better diet. Now "we have changed all that."

No American firm has contributed more towards bringing about this improved state of things than D. Appleton & Co., of New York. They are untiring in the publication of works of the class referred to. We scarcely finish reading one before another appears. To them we are just indebted for three before we have found leisure to notice one. On our table lie Tyndall's "Fragments of Science for Unscientific People," Spencer's "Recent Discussions in Science, Philosophy, and Morals," and Proctor's "Light Science for Leisure Hours." We have space only for a few words concerning each.

Prof. Tyndall, whose admirable little manual on "Light and Electricity" we noticed in these columns a few weeks ago, adds to the qualities of a master of science those of a skilled literary artist in a remarkable degree. There is a charm and delicacy in his style, and an imaginativeness, nay, at times a tenderness in his thought, that give him a wonderful hold on the reader's sympathies. One has but to read a few of the essays in the "Fragments of Science" (e. g. those on "Prayer and Natural Law," "Miracles and Special Providences," "Matter and Force," "Scientific Materialism," and especially the beautiful note entitled "Musings on the Matterhorn," page 123) to become keenly sensible of the baldness and poverty of the philosophy which strips Nature of all its mysteriousness, and imagines itself to have formulated the finest experiences of the human mind in a physico-chemical equation. Surely, he who can discover no religion in science will utterly fail to catch the low undertone of Prof. Tyndall's thought, the spirit of which is the spirit of Tennyson's lines—

"Let knowledge grow from more to more,
But more of reverence in us dwell."

Mr. Richard A. Proctor, author of "Other Words than Ours" and "The Sun—Ruler of the Planetary System" (both of which we have read with great pleasure and profit), has collected in his "Light Science for Leisure Hours" a number of exceedingly valuable and instructive miscellaneous essays, e. g. "The Earth a Magnet," "Our Chief Timepiece Losing Time," "Venus on the Sun's Face," "Is the Gulf Stream a Myth?" "Tornadoes," etc., etc., which greatly stimulate the desire for further information on all these topics. Mr. Proctor's eminence as an astronomer lends a special value to his writings on astronomical subjects. To those who are specially interested in what is called "Spirit-Photography," we commend his little article on "Photographic Ghosts;" while to the poor deluded people who are still bothering their brains in the hope of "Squaring the Circle," we commend his article with that title. There is a slight excess of self-consciousness in Mr. Proctor which a little mars his writings; but the solid merit of this book will make it warm friends everywhere.

Mr. Spencer's "Recent Discussions" can hardly be classed with the foregoing volumes as one devoted to the popularizing of science. It is quite as much devoted to the "differentiation" of himself from Mr. Hutton, Prof. Bain, Auguste Comte, and others. The article of chief popular interest is that on the "Origin of Animal Worship;" while the philosopher will be most interested in the "Classification of the Sciences" and the "Genesis of Science." A vehement worshipper of Mr. Spencer, who evidently believes in his infallibility as devoutly as the ultra-montane Catholic believes in that of Pope Pius IX, and who seems to take as profound comfort in his new Savior as the most fervid Methodist takes in Jesus, feeling greatly outraged by our late comments on Mr. Spencer's "Principles of Psychology," has taken us severely to task for them in a Boston paper. We should be sorry to aggravate his disorder by any further criticisms on his idol, especially as we think that he might easily find a worse one; and we are glad, therefore, to be able to say honestly that no one, Spencerolater or otherwise, can fail to be instructed by most of the essays in this volume.

"Our readers will remember Rev. F. C. Ewer as the man who found out that "Protestantism is a failure." He has, it seems, made another discovery, and is just out with the startling information that Christianity itself is also a failure. He says it is no use to close our eyes to the enormous wreck. He ought to write for THE INDEX."

So says the Liberal Christian, which prefers to "close its eyes to the enormous wreck."

"In thee have I loved the eternal!" said the dying Bunsen to his wife. No one ever loved the perishable, except as he "loves a beef-steak."

ORTHODOX CRITICISM GONE TO SEED.

The Morning Star, of Dover, N. H., the organ of the Freewill Baptists, shows less than its ordinary good sense in arguing that Free Religion is "maturing," because Mr. Towne calls Jesus an "ignorant youngster" and a "mad fanatic." About three years ago the same paper thought that Free Religion had already "matured" because we sharply criticised a religious revival in Dover (the lecture was published in THE INDEX, No. 40.) At this rate Free Religion may be set down as a triennial plant, flowering once in three years. The article we refer to will be found on a previous page.

Such ludicrous endeavors to argue down a movement by showing oneself stone-blind to its purport are characteristic of all the criticisms we see on Free Religion from orthodox sources. Orthodoxy is getting excited, and strikes out wildly in all directions. Would that we could discover at least one writer in the orthodox ranks of brain enough to see what Free Religion really means and of manliness enough to meet the issue without evasion! But our wish is foolish. Such a man would be—a "Free Religionist."

The trouble is here. Christianity has its pivotal point in mere self-devotion to Jesus—to a Person. The ablest orthodox sermon we ever listened to was by Professor Park, of Andover, Mass., on the text—"For I am determined not to know anything among you save Jesus Christ, and him crucified." Christianity, as such, can never know anything else. It understands nothing else. It understands no religion that does not revolve about a person. Even Dr. J. F. Clarke, a "Liberal Christian," thinks the radicals can only exchange one master for another—can only desert from Jesus to run to Emerson, or Parker, or somebody else. Hence the Morning Star holds that Free Religion has come to a head, and developed all its unfathomable wickedness, when it comes to hate instead of loving Jesus. And it fancies Mr. Towne has touched bottom at last in this direction.

The simple truth is that Free Religion cannot be understood by any Christian. It ignores persons, and values principles. It eschews all idolatries. It obeys no Lord. It has no Christ. It cares nothing about Jesus, except as a mere matter of historic justice. We are sorry to hear such phrases used about him, because we believe them to be unjust. But when the Morning Star thinks it is the logical outcome of Free Religion to hate Jesus, it falls into folly as great as ours would be, if we said it was the logical outcome of Christianity to hate Pharaoh Necho. In our opinion Mr. Towne spends his fine energies to little purpose, and wastes his powder, when he attacks the personal character of Jesus. He may be right, or he may be wrong,—we believe, wrong. But he is at any rate off the point. And the Morning Star is just as much off the point, when it takes one individual's opinion about another individual as indicative of the essential nature of Free Religion. The Star must learn to understand PRINCIPLES, in their universality, before it can attain the faintest conception of what Free Religion is. Until then, its little attempts to argue it down in this less than manly fashion can only excite well-bred contempt among all respectably informed persons.

ALL ALIKE.

There is a story of an Italian mountaineer who brought into a summer resort some young wolves for sale. He had named them, by way of satire, after several priests in the neighborhood; and when a purchaser asked, rather timidly, which of the dangerous little animals was the gentlest, the reply was—"Take which you please; they are all wolves."

Such a story could only have arisen where the clergy are outwardly more revered and secretly more hated than is here the case. But the illustration is good for thus much, at least; the traits of the clergy, as a class, do not belong to any special theology or church discipline. They proceed from the position of the class, as such; Roman Catholic or Protestant, orthodox or heretic, it is much the same thing. Take any set of men in the world; shut them up in a study or in a pulpit; give them the control of one day in seven; let them speak uncontradicted, and be paid for so speaking; and the inevitable result will follow. They will come to be regarded, and will come to regard themselves, as a superior class. The youngest of them will speak with assumed authority to the oldest layman; the most ignorant of them will assume to instruct the best informed layman. Not that they are naturally more conceited than other people, but conceit is forced upon them.

A reverential layman, in Scribner's Monthly, rebukes the late Mr. Hawthorne for indifference to church-going, and assures that wonderfully gifted man that he could easily have found, in any village, clergymen who were his intellectual superiors.

I do not know how this seems to those who have known little of clergymen except to drink in their words on Sunday. But to those who have been in the ministry, or have studied in a theological school, the unintentional satire of this sentence is something tremendous. Or when one goes from parish to parish and hears the estimate placed upon the intellectual ability of each successive clergyman by the educated men of his flock, it is evident that some prestige other than intellectual is needed to sustain the clergy in any position of authority. However it may have been a century ago, it seems incredible that any one should now claim any mental superiority for the clerical profession over any other.

Be that as it may, the fact remains that, under all forms, the spirit and tendency of a separate clerical class is the same. The habitual attitude of authority becomes at last an imperative demand. From the assumption that it is the duty of their parishioners to come and hear them preach, there follows naturally the assumption that it is also a duty to obey their preaching. Even where the fulcrum of future punishment is wanting (as among the Unitarians and Universalists), there is still as resolute a plying of the lever; and Dr. Miner or Dr. Bellows—each as good a man, doubtless, as an average Pope—is still a Pope in his whole attitude and method.

Rev. Dr. Newman, of Washington, writes letters marked "Confidential" to leading Methodists in Iowa, urging the re-election of Senator Harlan of that State, on the ground (among other points) that he "is regular in attendance at church, and his influence is in the right direction." Had this been done by a Jesuit priest, the Protestant papers would all have joined to give the alarm. When done by a Methodist, it simply shows that they are all alike. The legislature of New York voted money to endow many Roman Catholic and a few Protestant schools. The Massachusetts legislature, without even this poor pretence of fair distribution, voted money to an Evangelical institution for girls at South Hadley, while the Roman Catholics tried in vain for years to obtain so much as an act of incorporation for their college.

I asked a prominent Western man, the other day, whether the Roman Catholic church was making much progress at the West. He answered—"The danger to religious liberty in America is not so much from the Roman Catholic church as from the Young Men's Christian Association. Their demand for more rigid Sunday laws and for a religious amendment to the Constitution are the entering wedges of something more dangerous than Romanism, because more plausible. They are all alike."

It is on this ground, doubtless, that Mr. Grote has lately endowed a professorship in London University College, and Mr. Barnes a college in Indiana, with the provision that no clergyman shall be among the teachers. But this is not the way to reach the evil. You cannot fight narrowness by narrowness, nor set one bigotry against another. To expel all Roman Catholic teachers from your public schools—as was done lately in a town on Long Island—is the way to help, not hinder, the Catholic church. There are but two consistent positions,—to tolerate all opinions or to enforce your own.

FALSE PROVERBS.

There is an old proverb that accidents or misfortunes "never come singly;" and surely the events of the last week in August seem to verify it. We had within a week accidents more than single—double and even quadruple. The Boston daily papers of the 28th of August contained accounts of no less than four frightful accidents—the appalling calamity at Revere, that cast a gloom over all New England; a destructive railroad collision near Westford, Pa.; an excursion-boat boiler explosion in Mobile Bay, that put that city in mourning, and a powder-mill explosion near Athens by which more than one hundred persons lost their lives. When we read in one day this long catalogue of casualties, following so close upon the Westfield ferry-boat disaster, we were half disposed to believe that there might be some truth in the old proverb. We have met several persons this week who were profoundly convinced of its truth. They think that there is some mysterious under-current of law uniting events and disposing accidents in pairs, triplets, etc.; that, like measles, accidents are contagious; that there is probably a something floating in the air that produces epidemics of accidents. But, whatever the philosophy of the proverb, they had no doubt of its truth.

Now, however old and sacred this saying may be, we believe there is no truth in it. Misfortunes as a matter of fact do come singly very often; and the reason that they so often seem to come double is because we double them up. We draw together two single accidents, separated in time, in order to make a double one, and thus save the authority of the proverb. Whenever the rule will apply, we are sure to apply it, and to talk and marvel much about it; but when it will not apply, we never once think of the proverb.

A good old lady who believes that accidents never come singly, when she heard of the great Revere disaster, exclaimed,—“Yes, it’s a year of accidents, for the year came in on Friday, didn’t it?” No, said we; the year came in on Sunday, therefore Sunday should hereafter be called the “unlucky day.” She smiled, but clung to her proverb. The fact of it is that many of the old saws and adages and proverbs are superstitions and wholly false, while many more are merely half-truths. For instance, what truth is there in the popular saying—“It is always darkest just before day?” We have never heard of any scientific proof, nor indeed of any testimony of common observation, to verify it. Like the scriptures, it is believed by many as a matter of course, because their fathers believed it. “It is truly surprising,” says Carlyle, “how long a rotten post may stand, provided it be not shaken.” We can easily conceive how this last proverb might have originated. Almost every one at some time in his life, we suppose, finds himself in a dark place, in the deep shadow of some great affliction, and, perhaps, near the pit-hole of despair. He wants to believe that there is a good time coming when the light will dispel the darkness about him, and to believe that that time is near at hand; and as the wish is so often the father of the thought, the author of the proverb says—“The light is near, very near, because it is very dark; cheer up, it is all right. Don’t you know it is always darkest just before day?” (or ought to be, which is all the same). A proverb that is so comforting and chimes in with our wishes will not readily be questioned, especially when it claims to be based on some natural phenomenon not easily disproved, though not proved.

Can we not strengthen our courage without a resort to false proverbs? The rotten post ought to be “shaken.” Many other old sayings are only half-truths, though they generally pass current without discount. Such are—

“A rainbow at night is a sailor’s delight, &c.” Now we have of late observed two rainbows at night and rain the next day. That accounts for our stubborn scepticism on this point.

“Marry in haste, and repent at leisure.” Yes, sometimes, perhaps generally, but not always.

“A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush.” That depends on circumstances—not if you are a good shot and have a double-barrelled shot-gun loaded in your hand.

“One man’s meat is another man’s poison.” What man’s meat is what man’s poison?

“Practice makes perfect.” Never!

“Still waters run deep.” Still waters run shallow, sometimes.

“The more, the merrier.” That depends upon how many more, and where, and who.

“The remedy is worse than the disease.” Not at all true of the sweet little pills of homœopathy.

“You cannot catch old birds with chaff.” Not crows, perhaps, but geese you can.

Thus we might proceed to give other illustrations of half-truth proverbs. We do not mean to declare war against all proverbs, only against the absolute authority of those that claim universal application. They look too much like little infallible Popes. They domineer over reason. They put an abrupt veto on argument with their—“It is” or “It isn’t,” “for thus saith Pope Proverb;” and reason humbly bows her head in submission, and the tongue retreats in silence. Don’t we need some Dr. Doellinger protest against these impudent little Popes right here at home, who lord it over us? So it seems to

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

MR. VOYSEY’S BIBLE LECTURE.

THE INDEX could not have done its readers a better service than to give the invaluable lecture of Mr. Voysey. I hope it is only introductory and that its talented author will continue to prosecute a work thus so well begun through several such discourses. Nor can the Index Association do a greater service to the cause of truth, than to scatter such lectures in cheap form everywhere, like the already scattering leaves of autumn. I am glad you have begun with Mr. Voysey’s first Bible Lecture. I will help to advertise it in all my fields. THE INDEX cannot announce it too much.

More is doing than many suppose, not only to get the Bible introduced into the schools, but to place the whole system of school education under church control. In many places where I go, school teachers are examined quite as closely as to their religious beliefs and disbeliefs, as to any branch of literary culture. In one or two instances lately I have found that teachers have been rejected for attending a course of lectures on Spiritualism. Disreputable as many are seeking to make the cause of Spiritualism, and unfortunate as in some directions it seems to be, still there is no other influence abroad now so hated and dreaded by the bigoted priesthood and blind, bewildered sectarian church-membership. The church never mistakes in marking who or what are her most dangerous foes. Zion’s Herald keeps up a little fusillade on THE INDEX; though most of the larger, abler religious journals seem rather to pass it by. But not one of them overlooks the advance of Spiritualism. Not that THE INDEX is not doing a work which will ere long reveal itself, like but the tread of Spiritualism even now shakes the sea and the land.

The “Bible in Schools” is almost becoming a test question in politics, in many places. And few have any idea how ignorant are thousands and thousands of saintly people as to its character and contents. They do not read, they perform it.

By the New York papers it appears that a new effort is to be made to suppress some of the grosser forms of licentiousness now reeking there. Among the measures, obscene publications are to be suppressed. Does any establishment in that whole city scatter so many unclean, obscene tales as the American Bible Society? Dryden and even Shakespeare are condemned by and banished from many Christian households, who yet clamor for the Bible in all the schools. Not long ago I met with a truly conscientious man who denied point-blank that certain passages I described were in the book. When they were produced, he accepted them as every word inspired by the Holy Ghost. But even he would not say that he cared to have them read by the classes in schools. He did not know that the Old Testament abounds in such. The church generally does not know it. The priesthood do not tell the church.

And much of the morality of the book is as false as many of its statements are filthy. And the clergy don’t tell the people that, either. They know it, but conceal the truth. They do not want the book in the schools to make the rising generation better. Not a bit of it. They desire it as a means for greater degradation and enslavement. The Bible is the talisman, the sorcerer’s charm, in the priestly hands; and the earlier they commence, and the more general and constant they can make their diabolical displays of authority over the human mind, especially the young mind, the tighter they can rivet their inexorable chains.

So let us have Voysey and the like of him as fast and far as human possibility will permit.

TO MY FRIENDS.

’Neath the shelter of the mountains,
In a cottage by the sea,
To fraternal love respondeth
Grateful heart, on bended knee;
With the human trust is blended
Joy of Immortality.

As the unseen hands are clasping
Mine that stretch imploringly,
Through the sweetness of compassion,
Glory infinite I see;
All earth’s ministry of goodness
Lights my spirit unto Thee!

With the hymning of the breezes,
Swelling anthem of the sea,
Blends the music that, eternal,
Is earth’s offering unto Thee,—
The deliverance song of ages,
From the spirit rendered free.

For the human love, revealing
What the Infinite must be,—
For earth’s ministering angels
That in kindness unto me,
With the spirit’s recognition,
Send their bounty o’er the sea,—

Thanks from out the depths are welling,
God of goodness, unto Thee!
Unknown brothers, that renewal
Of life’s promise bring to me,
May your spirits list the music
Of a lone heart by the sea.

CORA WILBURN.

CAMDEN, Maine, Sept. 7, 1871.

[Miss Wilburn desires us to print the above verses “as a slight, grateful token of the interest that unknown and liberal friends are manifesting towards me.”

She is in hope of soon purchasing on mortgage the cottage she covets, by paying what she has already. “But the cruel winter is at hand,” she adds, “and a hundred dollars would help me much.” While our own greater plan of raising $50,000 is prospering so well, we cannot forget this poor, lonely woman, longing to secure a little home of her own to shelter her declining years. We feel personally grateful to the kind friends who have already helped her, and trust that others will step forward to fill out the insignificant sum that is alone wanted to make a human heart happy by the prospect of an honorable independence.—ED.]

FLEE FROM THE WRATH TO COME!

MR. ABBOT:—

I take the liberty of sending you a few books, namely, Menno Simon’s “Instruction,” the “Illustrating Mirror,” and a pamphlet entitled “Non-Resistance Asserted." Now these books are in themselves a complete library of religious knowledge.

I have myself had the rare opportunity of being brought up under the influence of the truth as contained and taught in those books, and a powerful influence it was, even to the effect of making it criminal for me at any time to entertain any doubts or to raise any questions against those doctrines. I send them with the hope that you will notice them and recommend them to all seeking for the truth, as containing the whole of God's will to man—trusting that thousands more may learn to avoid thinking for themselves, and cease inquiring into the why and wherefore of things. It is vastly important that every one who once believes should be careful never to doubt or disbelieve, for fear of being cursed of God and excommunicated from the Church of the saints and delivered over to Satan.

For full information on this all-important subject as taught, believed, and practised by the chosen (few) people of God, read Menno Simon's Explanation of the true Apostolic Separation or Excommunication.

Yours for the progress of right and truth and a universal orthodox redemption,

MEDICUS.

"THE INDEX TO ITS FRIENDS."

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Sept. 12, 1871.

EDITOR INDEX:—Your leader entitled as above in this week's INDEX, has the right ring, means business, and must be responded to by the friends of Free Religion throughout the country. The "Subscription to Stock" must reach $100,000. It can be done, if every radical will do his or her duty. Where is the man or woman with any property who can not take at least $100 stock? "No indebtedness can be incurred by the Association beyond ten per cent." No one will, therefore, under any circumstances be called upon for more than $10 in one year; and if made such a paper as you, Mr. Abbot, will make it if sustained, I believe in less than five years the stock will be above par. But who can not afford to give $10 a year to this cause?

This subscription list is not only valuable in a financial point of view, but it is in fact a working organization, the influence of which will be beneficial in many respects.

It is the first enrolment of those who are prepared to go to the front in the war for spiritual freedom, and I am glad that D. R. Locke's name leads the list. No pen has done more for freedom in this country during the last ten years than his. The name of "Nasby" is a household word everywhere. The great Impeachment trial never damaged Andy Johnson so much as "Nasby's" "Swinging (him) around the Circle."

And so far as the success of THE INDEX is concerned, those names add much more than the money subscribed. These subscribers will consider THE INDEX their paper, and will feel an interest (or many of them will at least) in its success that they otherwise would not.

There should be a few stock subscribers in every town. This would give THE INDEX a force that can be depended upon to work for its circulation.

Friends, now let us all go to work at once and assist Mr. Abbot in the "great eternal battle of freedom against tyranny." He has pledged us that, if we will give him money, he will "make THE INDEX known far and wide," and will "induce the ablest thinkers of the age to speak through its columns," and make it a "power and influence" in the land. I believe, if liberals will do their duty, the Editor, who has done so much already for our cause, will more than fulfill what he has promised. Let those that have properly subscribe at once, and those who have none impress the importance of this work on those who have. And while engaged in this work, do not forget to ask every one that claims to be liberal to subscribe for THE INDEX itself.

Mr. Abbot, please forward me a number of copies of No. 89, that I may refer those who have money to the article just referred to, entitled "THE INDEX TO ITS FRIENDS." It would be well to have that editorial put into a circular for general distribution. No one can read it without being impressed with the importance of securing the necessary stock subscription.

INTUITION IN THE LIGHT OF COMMON SENSE.

TIPPECANOE CITY, O., Aug. 27, 1871.

MR. ABBOT:—I see in THE INDEX a good deal of talk about Intuition and Reason which to me appears quite indistinct. The mind of man is constantly coming to conclusions. If any one can, I wish he would give some rule by which it may always be known whether the conclusion is born of Reason, Instinct, or Intuition. I will give several instances, in my own experience, of conclusions come to in the minds of men and animals (and my experience is the same as thousands of others), and then I hope some one will tell me of what parentage they were born, if it is of any importance to know.

One night, when I was young, I was four miles from home. About half-way between where I was and my dwelling, lived two young ladies whom I wished to see very much, and I intended to stop at their house for that purpose. But on my way home, and before I reached their dwelling, in my imagination, if you please, I met the two ladies in a very definitely marked place in the road, about half-way between their homes and mine. So sure was I that I should meet them at the place imagined, that, when I came to their homes, I kept right on, and met them as I had imagined. Here the conclusion was truth.

When I was a boy, my father had an old sow that had a litter of pigs one year in the month of March, under the north-east corner of his barn. A few days after her hogship was seen prospecting about in a very lively manner, and by night she made a new nest under the south-west corner, and moved her family there. Before morning a snow-storm was blowing from the north-east which would have incommoded her very much, had she not changed location.

No longer ago than yesterday, my son was breaking a colt. For this purpose the colt was harnessed by the side of a large, steady horse. The colt behaved very badly; the old horse got out of patience, caught the colt by the neck, and shook it severely. Colt then stood still. Old horse put his nose to the colt's nose in a very affectionate manner. Again, in going along, the old horse was stopped by the action of the colt. He repeated the shaking and caressing. Colt subsided. After this, if colt misbehaved, horse would lay back his ears and look daggers at colt, which was enough to insure good behavior. Now colt appears pretty well broken.

There once lived a boy at my house, about twelve years of age. One morning, on getting up, he said to me that a man was to come that day or soon after to our house to borrow four hundred dollars. He described the man and gave his name. All of this was literally true before night. Neither the boy nor I had ever seen the man before.

I once knew an illiterate man who thought himself called to preach (I have known many such, and who has not?). He was to go just as the Lord (intuition) directed him. Under such influence, he went to preach to many families, and the promised result—conversions—followed his ministrations. This was not always the case, for sometimes he was under this influence sent to preach, great results being promised, and he would find no one to preach to. Finally he concluded, great results being promised, that it was his duty to give out an appointment to preach in a certain grove, his stand to be under a large oak tree. Accordingly the appointment was made at four o'clock one summer morning. It proved to be a very rainy morning, and no one but himself attended; but after the shower was over, some of his neighbors found him dead under the tree, having been killed by lightning.

I have no need to give more cases. The world is full of them. Nor need I give cases where reason has done her very best in solving problems and has concluded very wide of the truth. The world is full of them, also. In all such cases it would be very interesting to know where intuition, instinct, or chance stops, and reason begins.

Yet I don't know that such knowledge is of any great importance, for truth is equally beneficial, let it come from where it may. We know that not all conclusions arrived at by reason are correct, and we do know that man does sometimes come to correct conclusions that reason knows no way of reaching; and yet the higher a man gets in the scale of intelligence, the more and more he will, and should, depend upon his reasoning faculties for truth. Pure reason will not dogmatize negatively or affirmatively. I think the evidence is conclusive that, the further back we trace man, the more he depended on instinctive impressions, or intuition, for his guide.

I know some men and more women who depend upon their intuitions, or whatever it may be, for their conclusions; and they are very generally right, too. Are not all intuitions short but undefinable ways of reasoning?

We all know there are extraordinary cases of rapid calculation, when a man sets down without error, and rapidly too, the product of any two large given numbers. It appears like instinct or intuitive knowledge. Let us all learn to reason—reason in as short a manner as possible, without a sacrifice of truth. I have but little faith in any conclusions not based on reason, and not implicit faith in all conclusions said to be reached by reason.

E. L. CRANE.

THE SABBATH AND THE CIVIL LAW.

MR. ABBOT:—It is evident you have but little respect for the Sabbath, and I judge that you are in favor of its practical abolition. I can readily conceive how gentlemen of culture and learning may differ widely with me in regard to the religious sanctions of the Sabbath; but in consideration of the manifestly beneficent character of this institution, I am at a great loss to understand your indifference, not to say enmity, towards it. We do not call for the enforcement of any religious Sabbath. There is in fact, at the present time, no attempt to do this here in America. Christians cannot, of course, be made by force. But the American Sabbath is a civil institution,—all the better, in my estimation, that God gave it and sanctioned it. But the government has to do with it as a humane institution, a necessity for man, a benevolent arrangement for man's highest physical, moral, and spiritual good, and the welfare and stability of society. As such, it is protected by law in our country; and who can deny the legitimacy and constitutionality of such a procedure? All this outcry about "the rights of conscience" and "personal freedom" is the sheerest nonsense, inasmuch as there is not an institution in the country enforced by law against which precisely the same clamor might not be raised. Under all the circumstances, however much you and others may differ in matters of religion, I am surprised you should identify yourself with the un-American opposition to our American Sabbath.

R. H. HOWARD.

[The "American Sabbath," as enforced by civil statutes, is not a "civil institution." It is a transparent pretence to call it such. The real bulwark of the "American Sabbath" is the Evangelical sentiment of the country, without which there would be no such laws as now exist, forbidding innocent recreations and useful occupations which in fact interfere with nobody's convenience of worship. The "American Sabbath" is an ecclesiastical institution, which under false pretences has got the support of state and municipal laws. We are in favor of abolishing all such laws, and of leaving it to the people to decide freely, each man for himself how much or how little of a "Sabbath" he will have. But the crafty policy now pursued by Sabbatarians (see the N. Y. Illustrated Christian Weekly, for example) of representing the Sunday question as a mere issue between "church and lager beer" is thoroughly dishonest. They try to blink the fact that there is a rapidly growing American opposition to the "American Sabbath," and endeavor to stir up a vile Know-Nothing prejudice by representing this opposition as due only to German influences. Let the Sabbatarians meet this issue like men, and recognize the plain fact that they are fighting the whole tendency and spirit of the age. The Pope openly declares war against the nineteenth century. The Sabbatarians equally war against it, but without this bold and honest declaration of war. If voluntarily observed, we are strongly in favor of Sunday as a day of rest; but we oppose the "American Sabbath," as an utter violation of American ideas and principles. America is forever on the side of freedom: Sabbatarianism is today one of her most dangerous, because secret, enemies. —Ed.]

OUR INDIAN TROUBLES.—Why we have no abiding peace with the Indians on our western border may be inferred from this narrative: Gen. Stoneman says that, when he first saw the Apaches in 1846, they were splendidly mounted; every warrior rode a stallion, and every squaw a mare. They were dressed in buckskins, their lances were bright, and their trappings superb. Seven hundred of them rode together. They were the terror of Mexico, and rode far into the republic; but they treated the Americans with chivalry, and bands of California emigrants could ride through Arizona unharmed. The Arizona Apache is now a starving hyena, eating squirrels, rats, owls, anything to keep life and vengeance alive. Cochise, the leader of the band, himself is said to be a splendid physical specimen of a man, of wonderful alertness and remarkable sagacity. He was at peace with the whites, when his camp was attacked, and his wife and brother captured. Some days afterward he and nine other men rode up to the attacking party, mounted on good horses and holding lariats to which were attached the necks of nine white captives. Cochise's message was: "Give up my wife and my brother, and these prisoners shall be set free." The white people answered this by hanging on a gallows the chief's wife and brother, and immediately the Indians bounded off, dragging the unfortunate hostages over the desert. Since that time Cochise has been merciless in his vengeance, and his name is a terror throughout the border. Although the horrible cruelties he has committed on unoffending whites cannot be excused, it must be remembered that he was not the aggressor in the first instance, and that he was only pursuing the mode of warfare which is considered perfectly legitimate among his race. If this remarkable man could be induced to become friendly once more, his influence on the wild tribes would be of incalculable advantage to us. But what prompting has he to become so?—Commonwealth.

The Far East, published at Yokohama, Japan, says that twelve women, evidently persons of refinement and cultivation, were marched through the streets of Yedo quite recently, with their hands tied behind their backs, and under a strong guard, on their way from the common prison to another intended for the most degraded females. They are said to be the mothers, wives and daughters, of nine mutineers, and they have been sentenced to imprisonment for the guilt of their sons, husbands and fathers! The strongest believers in vicarious punishment must be shocked by this palpable injustice, especially when we consider that the mutineers themselves had already been put to death. But if "imputed righteousness" is just, why is not imputed unrighteousness just also?—Christian Register.

NOT OUT YET.—"Have you," said an inquiring minded and slightly worldly gentleman, recently, to a bookseller on Washington street, "have you Christ's Sermon on the Mount?" "Christ's Sermon on the Mount!" exclaimed the bookseller, with great surprise. "Yes," said the other; "it was mentioned last Sunday in a very charming discourse at our church as an admirable thing; but perhaps it isn't out yet!" The anxious inquirer was not corrected, but was permitted to go his way—"for he had great possessions."—Ex.

INDEX TRACTS

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION have published the following tracts, and will publish others of a similar character, if encouraged to do so by the receipt of enough orders to cover the expense:—

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no abler, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Fifteen copies One Dollar.

Also, the scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition by PARKER PILLSBURY, entitled "The Sunday Question," is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

Friends of Free Religion wishing to assist the publication of such tracts as these will please donate such sums as they think proper, which will be applied exclusively to this purpose. Address—

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Circulars with list of subjects will be sent on application.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

CHRISTIAN PROPAGANDISM.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, Sept. 16, 1871. First Lecture.]

A few weeks ago, I published some remarks on "The System of Foreign Missions," in reply to certain criticisms of the New York Independent. I had quoted as a common saying the statement that "it takes three dollars to send one to the heathen," which the Independent characterizes as a "stale slander." In reply to this, I said that Dr. Mullen, one of the best authorities on the subject, estimates the total expenditure of the fifty (Protestant) missionary societies throughout the world at $5,164,670, the total number of missionaries employed being 5,033. I then inquired—what is the annual total of "conversions" effected, and what proportion of this vast sum is expended directly on the heathen? I said I believed that fully seventy-five per cent. of these five millions is absorbed in salaries and running expenses of various kinds—quoted an English authority as estimating the probable cost of each convert to Christianity in Siam at ten thousand pounds—and added that it would take more than the "Reports" of interested parties to convince me that the greater portion of this golden stream does not sink into the sand of ecclesiastical organizations. I then added some remarks on the general uselessness of this vast system of missions, characterizing it as a stupendous fraud upon credulous Christendom.

This article has elicited from some of my best friends keen yet kind and thoughtful remonstrances, which have induced me to select Christian Propagandism as the topic of one or two special lectures. I will begin by quoting the letters received, that the objections raised may be stated in their full force. The first says:—

"I thought you shifted your ground a bit about the missionaries. Your first ground was that the means were wasted in the machinery, and did not reach the end—your second that the end itself is of little value. This does not seem to me quite fair. Moreover, on the first ground I don't think you quite hold your own, for 'payment of salaries' includes salaries of missionaries themselves, which were legitimately the main objects of appropriation; as much as for an anti-slavery society to pay the salaries of its agents."

To this letter I would say that I do not think I shifted my ground. True, I did intend to say that the means are wasted in the machinery, to at least the extent of seventy-five per cent., and that they do not reach the end aimed at. But what is the end aimed at? Not the payment of missionaries' salaries, but manifestly the conversion of all the world to Christianity. It appears to me that I was arguing directly to the point, when I inquired very sceptically as to the annual total of conversions effected, to offset this annual outlay of five million dollars, and when I quoted the opinion of a competent English witness that in Siam, at least, it takes fifty thousand dollars to make one good convert. If this be the case, there is plainly enough an enormous waste of means somewhere. What I afterwards added about the valuelessness of the end itself was supplementary—an addition naturally suggested by my subject. I cannot perceive, therefore, that I was at all unfair, although I could doubtless have expressed myself more fully and in a manner less liable to misunderstanding. My reasoning was too elliptical, but, I think, to the point.

The second objection made by my friend is that the payment of salaries to the missionaries themselves should be excepted in any estimate of waste involved in running the machinery of foreign missions, since these salaries are the main objects of appropriation. If this view of the matter is correct, I am of course in the wrong, and could not justly say that three-fourths of the money raised sink into the sand of ecclesiastical organizations. But it never occurred to me to make any such exception, nor did I ever imagine that it was made in the common saying I quoted about its taking three dollars to send one to the heathen. The words originally criticised by the Independent were these:—"Seventy-five per cent. of all moneys contributed for foreign missions goes to pay salaries and keep the ecclesiastical machinery in running order." I meant, of course, to include the salaries of the missionaries, who are the chief part of the machinery. In estimating the running expenses of a Baptist or Methodist church at home, is it usual to throw out of the account the salary of the minister, which usually constitutes, at the very least, half of the annual expenditure? Certainly not. Then why throw out the salaries of the missionaries from the running expenses of the missionary societies? I see no more reason for doing so in this than in the other case.

Moreover, is it quite correct to say that the missionaries' salaries are the "main objects of appropriation?" The main object of all appropriations by missionary societies is ostensibly the conversion of the heathen; and all salaries, whether of home officials or of missionaries in the field, are simply means to this end. I see no essential distinction between these two classes of salaries. Whether the money spent in paying these salaries, of one class as well as of the other, is wasted or not, and, if wasted, to what extent, depends wholly on the success or failure of the entire machinery in accomplishing its purpose—namely, the conversion of the heathen. If the heathen are converted, the money reaches them; if not, not. If they should not be converted at all, the money spent would be wholly absorbed in running a machine which effects no results. When I said that I believe fully three-fourths of the money spent to be thus absorbed, I think I understated, not overstated, the truth. Further on I will at least make good my charge.

The other letter I referred to says:—

"I fear you have fallen into a mistake that will give you trouble. The charge that 'it takes three dollars to send one to the heathen—in other words, that seventy-five per cent. of all moneys contributed for foreign missions goes to pay salaries and keep the ecclesiastical machinery in running order'—cannot be sustained. Few persons have had better opportunities than I of observing the doings of Protestant and Catholic missionaries and missionary societies, at home and abroad—in Boston, New York, and London—in India and China, the Indian Archipelago, Cape of Good Hope, and the Mediterranean; and I have never known of any facts that would at all justify the above charge. The quotations you make do not touch this point. I believe these societies are as honestly and economically managed as the better sort of public institutions—colleges, banks, insurance companies, for instance. Doubtless the whole system of Christian and sectarian propagandism—home as well as foreign—liberal and even radical as well as orthodox—is a mistake. But that is not the point in dispute between THE INDEX and the Independent. The charge made by THE INDEX and denied by the Independent is that three-fourths of the receipts for foreign missions are absorbed by running expenses. I believe with the Independent that 'none of them has ever expended anything like the proportion Mr. Abbot charges them with using.' I think that the Independent is right in calling it a stale slander. I used to hear it forty years ago, and have looked in vain for proof ever since. Christian missions are the modern and improved form of crusades, and, like the crusades, will probably be followed by important and valuable results,—though not the kind of results especially hoped for and died for by crusaders and missionaries. I dislike the pushing, aggressive, provoking, 'propagandist spirit of Christianity' and of Mohammedanism; and I dislike the same spirit, when found, as it sometimes is, in THE INDEX,—often, in other religious papers,—seldom, almost never, in the Independent during these last few years."

Now it is plain that the writer of this letter has understood the charge I made in a very different sense from that I intended. In the article which originally drew out the strictures of the Independent, I said substantially that the officials of the various ecclesiastical organizations, including those devoted to the support of foreign missions, derived their entire living from the donations made by the churches for the various objects proposed; that they were thus consciously tempted or unconsciously biased to represent these donations of money as paramount Christian duties; but that fully three-fourths of the money thus raised produced no result beyond giving these officials a livelihood,—in other words, failed to that extent to accomplish the objects for which the whole was raised. If the Independent understood me (and it did not occur to me to doubt that it did), it was these charges it denied; and it was only to make these charges good that I noticed its criticisms at all. But the writer of this letter evidently understands me to hint, at least, that the missionary societies are fraudulently or extravagantly managed—a thing it never entered my head to suggest. I doubt not that they are "honestly and economically" managed, except in rare cases analogous to the Methodist Book Concern. Consequently his wide experience, cited against my charge, fails itself to "touch the point," or to have any bearing on my argument, unless it can prove that the missionary societies accomplish their purpose of converting the heathen. If they do not do this, they accomplish no purpose but that of supporting a swarm of officials at home and abroad who beat the air in vain; and that is what I meant at first and mean now by saying that this golden stream of five millions of dollars expended annually on foreign missions sinks mainly into the sand of ecclesiastical organizations. I regret that I did not make my points plainer, and admit that there was sufficient vagueness in my statements to justify misapprehensions; and it has been my purpose in this re-statement to make them so plain that no one who chooses to understand can misunderstand them. Nothing is less my desire than to be unfair to the missionaries or their home societies; but I do not credulously accept their own estimate of the importance, the value, or the success of their own operations, nor do I see anything but strict, however unpleasant, truthfulness in characterizing the entire missionary system as a stupendous, even if unconscious, fraud on credulous Christendom.

If to oppose this system in the interest of sound sense and right reason and human welfare appears to be the manifestation of a "pushing, aggressive, provoking, propagandist spirit," I must submit to the reproach. The task of warring against the great spiritual tyranny of Christianity is not a sweet or beautiful one; I often wish it had fallen into other hands than mine; but the duty of battling for human freedom breaks in roughly upon our pleasant pursuits and quiet tastes—and I count it just as imperative a duty to me to-day as it was to the young brother of mine who buckled on his sword-belt and went forth manfully to die at Gettysburg. I am sorry—extremely sorry—if I manifest at any time a spirit unworthy of the sacred cause I would fain serve in a temper worthy of it; but it is hard to keep a smooth brow or smiling face in the thick of the fight. The task of propagating liberal principles and high ideas may be, after all, a "mistake;" it would relieve me of much hard and distasteful work to be convinced that it is such. But I believe differently, and must act accordingly—even at the risk of appearing a "propagandist." If life were play or pleasure only—if on each soul there lay no high obligation to make known to others whatever truth seems most precious and most sorely needed,—then THE INDEX would never have been born. But it lives; and no one who sympathizes with its great purpose will, at least on second thought, blame it for "propagandism." It aims avowedly at nothing but "propagandism;" but what it seeks to propagate is truth instead of senseless superstition, manly and rational conviction instead of childish and mind-numbing "faith," the spirit of freedom instead of the spirit of slavery. If to any there seems no need of such propagandism as this, there will also seem to him no need of THE INDEX; but to me nothing seems more needed by the world than the multiplication of just such influences. So thinking, so I shall act.

But this is a digression, prompted incidentally by the frank and brave rebuke of a true friend. I must return to the subject of foreign missions, on which I have more to say.

Since the general truth or falsehood of my charge against the mission-system turns entirely on the degree of success it achieves in converting the heathen, I propose first to inquire what results, judged by its own standards of success, it has actually accomplished in this direction, comparing these results with the sums of money spent in accomplishing them; and afterwards to inquire what actual results it has accomplished, judged by our standards of success.

First, then, I must discover, if possible, how many converts are annually made to offset the annual outlay of over five millions of dollars. I confess that this method of testing the success of the missionary system may be challenged by Protestant Christian advocates. Every intensely earnest Christian who believes his own professed doctrines would say at once, that the salvation of one single soul from the awful miseries that await the unconverted will infinitely outweigh all the wealth, principal and interest, of the whole world—that the salvation of one single soul will alone justify the continuance of the missionary system with all its vast expense. Now on Christian grounds there is no gainsaying this argument. It is true and overwhelmingly conclusive, if Christian premises are true. But the latent common sense, even of the vast majority of professed Protestant believers, would notwithstanding revolt at the conclusion. If it could be proved to the satisfaction of the Protestant world that it took five million dollars a year to save a single heathen soul, the money would not be forthcoming. People would feel, whatever they said, that this was too expensive a job. They would lose all enthusiasm, in this advanced stage of human progress, and keep their cash in their pockets. This would be the case even with those most swift to challenge my test. They know that even the Protestant world has lost faith to a large extent in the terrors of hell, and that its interest in missions must be sustained by showing that they exert a wide influence in civilizing savages, in improving their morals, and in ameliorating their condition, here on earth. Without a fair show of success in this purely secular direction, the Protestant world's interest in missions would be speedily and wonderfully cooled. It will not give five millions of dollars a year to save one negro or one Papuan or one Chinaman from everlasting damnation after he is dead. But it will give this sum to save a great many such from this possible fate, provided civilization here on earth is thrown into the bargain.

We see here that mixture of religious and secular objects which is characteristic of Protestantism; the Catholics will give their money for the simple salvation of souls from hell, while the Protestant wants a little temporal improvement to boot. Hence the difficulty I referred to of making any fair test of the mission system satisfactory to Protestant Christians. Ostensibly the salvation of souls is the object; practically civilization is also demanded. I hold it to be perfectly fair to judge the system by the amount of Christianization it accomplishes; and I will accept church-membership as the recognized test of valid conversion. The Christianizing and the civilizing results are to be separated from each other,—the one class being the proper and direct fruits of the missionary theory, the other the indirect benefits flowing from it incidentally. I shall therefore judge the success of the missionary system by the number of converts it makes to Christianity, as compared on the one hand with the whole number to be converted, and on the other hand with the amount of money it costs to convert them. I see no other fair method of judging the success of Christian propagandism at the present day.

Now in forming my estimate of the degree of this success, I shall go at once to the highest authorities, relying mainly on the last edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica." I have spent many hours in studying and comparing all the articles I could discover in this magnificent work bearing on the subject. Tables are here given of the operations of forty-seven Protestant Missionary Societies, embracing all the important ones throughout Christendom. These societies, about a dozen years ago, spent annually $3,000,000 on their missions. I do not understand how Dr. Mullen's estimate of $5,000,000 is formed. The total number of their converts, communicants or church members in all these missions was at that time a little over 215,000—the entire fruits of their activity from their foundation. How large the annual increase had been, I cannot learn directly from these tables. But I have reached proximate results in the following manner.

The date of foundation is given in one of these tables in the case of each of these forty-seven missionary societies. Adding together the different numbers of years during which these various societies had been in operation down to 1858, and dividing the sum by forty-seven, I find the average duration of their activity, from their organization to that date, to be thirty-nine years. The total number of converts at that time (disregarding, of course, all those who had been previously converted and died) was 215,000. Dividing this number by thirty-nine, we have 5,538 converts as the average annual increase of church-membership during that period. In some years more, in other years less may have been converted; but on the average 5,538 heathen must have been converted every year for thirty-nine years, in order to give the missions 215,000 communicants in 1858.

Now I do not know the average annual expenditure of these forty-seven societies; but in 1858 it amounted to about $3,000,000. It seems fair to assume that the annual expenditure, which of course began with a very small amount and gradually increased to $3,000,000, amounted on the average to half this sum, or $1,500,000. Dividing, then, this average annual expenditure by the average annual gain of new converts, we arrive at $270 as the average cost of each convert to the missionary societies. This, then, may be set down as the cash price paid, on the average, by Protestant Christendom for the salvation of a heathen soul.

Out of the 215,000 converts, however, reported as communicants by all these forty-seven Protestant societies throughout the world, 88,807 are West India negroes, whose conversion, like that of our own negroes at the South, was undoubtedly the result in great part of slavery to Christian masters rather than to any special missionary activity from abroad. This fact ought to make a large reduction in the total above given. As an indication of the very meagre numerical results achieved by the Protestant missions, I will give the totals of converts in the chief countries, together with the totals of population in round numbers (the latter taken from a common Atlas):—

Turkey,	Population 15,000,000,	Converts 148
Asia Minor, Syria, and Armenia,	" 16,000,000,	" 558
Persia,	" 9,000,000,	" 100
India,	" 130,000,000,	" 19,370
Farther India,	" 42,000,000,	" 13,844
China,	" 369,000,000,	" 924
Africa,	" 71,000,000,	" 28,453
Oceania,	" 25,000,000,	" 48,249

These figures give a striking idea of the trifling impression made by all the Protestant missionary societies of entire Christendom combined, on the vast outlying swarms of "heathenism." It is well to note in passing, as incidental confirmation of the passage I quoted from Mr. Alabaster, that I find only thirty-seven converts credited to the kingdom of Siam, with its 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 of inhabitants.

In the tables on which I have based my calculations, I do not find a statement of the number of missionaries employed by these forty-seven societies. But according to the recent statement of Dr. Mullen, who, it is evident, gives only the statistics of Protestant missions, their present annual expenditure is over $5,000,000, while the number of missionaries is over 5,000 (the Catholics also employing as many as this). The whole of this enormous sum being directly or indirectly expended in supporting missionaries, each may be allowed, for all our purposes, a salary of $1,000, which, by my previous calculation of $270 as the cost of a single convert, would allow each missionary to make annually 3.7 converts in all. This is the highest possible average, on the supposition that all the $5,000,000 are expended directly on the work of evangelization, with absolutely no waste at all in any quarter; although it is more than probable that some waste occurs. Thus we arrive at these tangible results:—

1. Each new convert costs at least $270 in cash to the missionary societies, on the average.
2. Each missionary, on the average, makes only 3.7 converts in the course of a year.

At this rate, allowing 3.7 converts annually to each missionary, it would just about require the 36,000,000 of the whole American people, emigrating en masse on a missionary crusade, to convert Hindustan alone with its 130,000,000 in one year,—to say nothing of the rest of Asia or the world.

Or let me put the matter in a different light, and inquire how long it would take to convert heathendom at the present rate of Protestant Christian propagandism. Protestant Europe and America combined, as I have shown, with an average annual expenditure of $1,500,000, made for thirty-nine years an average annual increase of 5,538 new converts. At the same rate, with an annual expenditure of $5,000,000, they would make an annual increase of 18,460 new converts. Supposing, therefore, that the present rate of expenditure should continue unchanged, how long would it take to convert the 725,000,000 of the pagan world? And how much would it cost? It would take 39,273 years; and it would cost $196,365,000,000.

But this estimate of the time required to convert the heathen world is much too small. The required period is much reduced by a disproportionate apparent success achieved by the missionaries in the West Indies, where the work of conversion was really accomplished in great measure by other causes, and in the Pacific Islands, where a small population of very simple-minded savages was exposed to missionary influence under peculiar circumstances. The true test of the power of Protestant Christianity to convert the world must be applied in such cases as that of India and China. In India eighteen missionary societies have been zealously at work, probably the full average of thirty-nine years; and out of this vast population of 130,000,000 inhabitants, the table I quoted shows that only 19,370 converts were made. At this rate, it would take over 65,000 years to convert India alone. In China eighteen societies have been at work many years, though probably for a considerably less period than in India, and their converts numbered only 924. But allowing them to make full 1,000 converts annually, it would even then take 369,000 years to convert that vast hive of humanity, with its strong and stubborn civilization. Here the missionaries have to deal with no naked and childish savages, but with highly intellectual nations which were civilized while our own ancestors were wild barbarians; and they are brought into contact with religions which, as held by the better classes, are far superior to their own. This may seem a strong statement; but it must be remembered that the Christianity which is trying to convert India and China and the other so-called pagan nations teaches that all the unconverted are doomed to an everlasting hell for simple want of faith in Christ, while the religions it seeks to convert make in their turn no such monstrous claim. [See the article on the next page, entitled, "How the Pagan answered the Missionary."] These facts vastly increase the improbability of a speedy conversion of the world, and indefinitely lengthen the period required for the task. Unless an unprecedented increase in the rate of conversion should be made, which there seems no reason to expect, the world will remain unchristianized until a better religion than Christianity shall have come to take its place.

The task, therefore, which the Protestant missionary societies have set before themselves in the conversion of the entire world to Christianity, in order to be accomplished within one year, would require that about 196,000,000 missionaries should be employed instead of only 5,000. If, perceiving the impossibility of such a crusade as this, they prefer to work on as they now are working, it will take them at the very lowest estimate about 40,000 years to accomplish their task. The attempt, therefore, to convert the world by the machinery now employed is so miserably, nay, so ludicrously inadequate, that I can compare it to nothing but an attempt by a little boy to dig down Mount Washington with a tea-spoon. Ever since September, 1556, when the first Protestant missionaries, fourteen Swiss reformers, went from Geneva to Brazil to labor among the Indians, Protestantism has kept in motion its missionary machinery; and the net result of all this activity, kept up for centuries, is a little over 215,000 converts to-day—or about 1-3600 of the vast mass to be converted. The work to be done is avowedly the conversion of the world to Christ; but it is a work that practically can never be accomplished. A very expensive machine is set to work on an impossible and endless job; it is a paying operation only to those who get their living out of it. Looked at in the light of Christian philanthropy alone, as the rescuing of a few brands plucked from the conflagration of a guilty world, of course it pays; but looked at in the light of common sense as the adaptation of professedly adequate means to an openly avowed end, it can be fittingly described by no word but fraud. The managers who publicly pretend to believe in the possibility of thus converting the world, and boldly assert it to credulous congregations for the sake of securing large contributions for missionary objects, are guilty of the old priestly trick of swindling the people while they laugh in their own sleeves. The missionary system is a bottomless box for the reception of the people's money; and no one knows this better than they.

In saying, then, that it takes three dollars to send one to the heathen, what did I mean? Whatever the saying has meant to other minds (and I see it has had one meaning I never attributed to it), it meant to me, in effect, that four dollars spent on foreign missions accomplish only the work of one dollar spent on home evangelization,—that, before equal results are attained abroad, four times the money must be spent that is required here,—that it takes three dollars to make one dollar really do one dollar's worth of evangelical work among the heathen. For unless the dollar converts the heathen, it does not get to them at all, but stops with the missionaries; it accomplishes no result but that of supporting an official for doing nothing. In the strict sense, the one dollar never gets to the heathen at all, since of course it is not paid to them in cash; it can only be said to get to them when a fair dollar's worth of good, as estimated by church-standards of value, is done to their souls. I have always understood the common saying I quoted in this manner, as exposing in a pungent phrase the costliness and inefficiency of the foreign mission system as compared with the home system of evangelization. If it is a charge of financial corruption against the managing boards of missionary associations, it is enough to say I have neither understood nor used it so.

Now the only exact way of finding out whether the saying, as I have used it, is true or not, is to compare the cost of a new convert made by the home missionary societies with the average cost ($270) of a new heathen convert. If the saying is true, the cost of a home convert should be $67.50. I have not the statistics for such a comparison. But I believe that a home missionary who should only make fifteen converts a year would not be considered as earning his salary, but soon be cashiered for inefficiency. Yet he would accomplish four times the work of a foreign missionary, who on the average makes only 3.7 converts a year. If fifteen converts a year are a fair average for a home missionary (and I think this a very low estimate), then the common saying is true,—that is, it takes at least the cost of fifteen converts here to make 3.7 converts abroad, or three dollars to get one to the heathen, or seventy-five per cent. of all moneys raised for foreign missions simply to run their necessary machinery. The charge I made is thus made good, at the very least. If I am mistaken in my reasoning or my data, I shall be very glad to be corrected; but I seem to be confirmed in my first impressions by a careful analysis of facts.

I have by no means finished what I have to say on this subject of "Christian Propagandism," but I must defer all further consideration of it to a subsequent lecture.

HOW THE PAGAN ANSWERED THE MISSIONARY.

[By Chao Phya Thipakon, a Siamese Minister of State, in his book entitled the "Kitchanukit." Translated by Henry Alabaster in "The Modern Buddhist," pp. 25-35.]

I have studied the Roman Catholic book, "Maha Kangwon," the Great Care, and it seems to me that the priests' great cares are their own interests. I see no attempt to explain any difficult and doubtful matters. If, as they say, God, when he created man, knew what every man would be, why did he create thieves? This is not explained. The book tells us that all those virtuous men who have taught religions differing from the Roman Catholic have been enemies of God, but it does not explain why God has allowed so many different religions to arise and exist. How much do this and all other religions differ on this point from the religion of Buddha, which allows that there are eight kinds of holiness leading to ultimate happiness! (i. e. does not insist on Buddhism being necessary to salvation).

The American missionary, Dr. Jones, wrote a book called the "Golden Balance for weighing Buddhism and Christianity," but I think any one who reads it will see that his balance is very one-sided; indeed, he who would weigh things ought to be able to look impartially at the scales.

Dr. Gutzlaff declared that "Somana Kodom (Buddha) only taught people to reverence himself and his disciples, saying, that by such means merit and heaven could be attained, teaching them to respect the temples, and Po-trees, and everything in the temple grounds, lest by injuring them they should go to hell; a teaching designed only for the protection of himself and his disciples, and of no advantage to any others." I replied, "In Christianity there is a command to worship God alone, and no other; Mahomet also taught the worship of one only, and promised that he would take into heaven every one who joined his religion, even the murderer of his parents, while those who would not join his religion, however virtuous their lives, should surely go to hell; also he taught that all other religions were the enemies of his religion, and that heaven could be attained by injuring the temples, idols, and anything held sacred by another religion. Is such teaching as that fit for belief? Buddha did not teach that he alone should be venerated, nor did he, the just one, ever teach that it was right to persecute other religions. As for adoration, so far as I know, men of every religion adore the holy one of their religion. It is incorrect of the Doctor to say that Buddha taught men to adore him alone. He neither taught that such was necessary, nor offered the alternative of hell as all other religions do.

I said to the missionary, "How about the Dewas the Chinese believe in, are there any?" He said, "No; no one has seen them; they do not exist; there are only the angels, the servants of God, and the evil spirits whom God drove out to be devils and deceive men." I said, "Is there a God Jehovah?" He answered, "Certainly, one God!" I rejoined, "You said there were no Dewas because no one had seen them; why then do you assert the existence of a God, for neither can we see him?" The missionary answered, "Truly, we see him not, but all the works of creation must have a master; they could not have originated of themselves." I said, "There is no evidence of the creation, it is only a tradition; why not account for it by the self-producing power of Nature?" The missionary replied, "that he had no doubt but that God created everything, and that not even a hair or a grain of sand existed of itself, for the things on the earth may be likened to dishes of food arranged on a table, and though no owner should be seen, none would doubt but that there was one; no one would think that the things came into the dishes of themselves." I said, "Then you consider that even a stone in the bladder is created by God?" He replied, "Yes. Everything. God creates everything!" "Then," answered I, "if that is so, God creates in man that which will cause his death, and you medical missionaries remove it and restore his health! Are you not opposing God in so doing? Are you not offending Him in curing those whom he would kill?" When I had said this, the missionary became angry, and saying I was hard to teach, left me.

Dr. Gutzlaff once said to me, "Phra Somana Kodom, having entered Nippan, is entirely lost and non-existent; who, then, will give any return for recitations in his praise, benedictions, reverences, and merit-making? It is as a country without a king, where merit is unrewarded, because there is no one to reward it; but the religion of Jesus Christ has the Lord Jehovah and Christ to reward merit, and receive prayers and praises, and give a recompense." I replied, "It is true that, according to the Buddhist religion, the Lord Buddha does not give the reward of merit; but if any do as he has taught, they will find their recompense in the act. Even when Buddha lived on earth, he had no power to lead to heaven those who prayed for his assistance but did not honor and follow the just way. The holy religion of Buddha is perfect justice springing from a man's own meritorious disposition. It is that disposition which rewards the good and punishes the evil. The recitations are the teachings of the Lord Buddha, which are found in various Soodras, set forms given by Buddha to holy hermits, and some of them are descriptions of that which is suitable and becoming in conduct. Even though the Lord has entered Nippan, his grace and benevolence are not exhausted. You missionaries praise the grace of Jehovah and Christ, and say that the Lord waits to hear and grant the prayers of those that call to Him. But are those prayers granted? So far as I see, they get no more than people who do not believe in prayer. They die the same, and they are equally liable to age and disease and sorrow. How, then, can you say that your religion is better than any other? In the Bible we find that God created Adam and Eve, and desired that they should have no sickness nor sorrow, nor know death; but because they, the progenitors of mankind, ate of a forbidden fruit, God became angry, and ordained that henceforth they should endure toil and weariness and trouble and sickness, and from that time fatigue and sorrow and sickness and death fell upon mankind. It was said that by baptism men should be free from the curse of Adam, but I do not see that any one who is baptized now-a-days is free from the curse of Adam, or escapes toil and grief and sickness and death, any more than those who are not baptized." The missionary answered, "Baptism for the remission of sin is only effectual in gaining heaven after death, for those who die unbaptized will certainly go to hell." But the missionary did not explain the declaration that by baptism men should be free from pains and troubles in their present state. He further said, "It does at times please God to accede to the requests of those that pray to Him, a remarkable instance of which is, that Europeans and Americans have more excellent arts than any other people. Have they not steam-boats and railways, and telegraphs and manufactures, and guns and weapons of war superior to any others in the world? Are not the nations which do not worship Christ comparatively ignorant?" I asked the Doctor about sorrow and sickness, things which prevail throughout the world, things in which Christians have no advantage over other men, but he would not reply on that point, and spoke only of matters of knowledge. Where is the witness who can say that this knowledge was the gift of God? There are many in Europe who do not believe in God, but are indifferent, yet have subtle and expanded intellects, and are great philosophers and politicians. How is it that God grants to these men, who do not believe in Him, the same intelligence He grants to those who do? Again, how is it that the Siamese, Burmese, Cochinese, and other Roman Catholic converts, whom we see more attentive to their religion than the Europeans who reside among us, do not receive some reward for their merit, and have superior advantages and intelligence to those who are not converted? So far as I can see, the reverse is the case: the unconverted flourish, but the converted are continually in debt and bondage. There are many converts in Siam, but I see none of them rise to wealth, so as to become talked about. They continually pray to God, but, it seems, nothing happens according to their prayer." The missionary replied, "They are Roman Catholics, and hold an untrue religion, therefore God is not pleased with them." I said to the missionary, "You say that God sometimes grants the prayers of those who pray to Him; now the Chinese, who pray to spirits and devils, sometimes obtain what they have prayed for; do you not, therefore, allow that these spirits can benefit man?" The missionary answered, "The devil receives bribes." I inquired, "Among the men and animals God creates, some die in the womb, and many at or immediately after birth, and before reaching maturity, and many are deaf, dumb, and crippled: why are such created? Is it not a waste of labor? Again, God creates men, and does not set their hearts to hold to His religion, but sets them free to take false religions, so that they are all damned, while those who worship Him go to heaven: is not this inconsistent with His goodness and mercy? If He, indeed, created all men, would He not have shown equal compassion to all, and not allowed inequalities? Then I should have believed in a creating God. But, as it is, it seems nothing but a game at dolls." The missionary replied, "With regard to long and short lives, the good may live but a short time, God being pleased to call them to heaven, and sometimes He permits the wicked to live to a full age, that they may repeat of their sins. And the death of innocent children is the mercy of God calling them to heaven." I rejoined, "How should God take a special liking to unlovable, shapeless, unborn children?" The missionary replied, "He who would learn to swim must practise in shallow places first, or he will be drowned. If any spoke like this in European countries, he would be put in prison." I invite particular attention to this statement.

Another time I said to the missionary Gutzlaff, "It is said in the Bible that God is the creator of all men and animals. Why should he not create them spontaneously, as worms and vermin arise from filth, and fish are formed in new pools by the emanations of air and water? Why must there be procreation, and agony and often death to mothers? Is not this labor lost? I can see no good in it." He replied, "God instituted procreation so that men might know their fathers and mothers and relatives, and the pains of child-birth are a consequence of the curse of Adam." I said, "If procreation was designed that men should know their relatives, why are animals, which do not know their relatives, produced in the same manner? And why do they, not being descendants of Eve, suffer pain in labor for her sin of eating a little forbidden fruit? Besides, the Bible says, by belief in Christ man shall escape the consequences of Eve's sin; yet I cannot see that men do so escape in any degree, but suffer just as others do." The missionary answered, "It is waste of time to converse with evil men who will not be taught," and so left me.

Make your expressions as concise and elegant as possible, but never forsake an idea for an Atticism.—Marvin.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"Much that you have written during the past year I have enjoyed very much. Your sermon on the 'Incarnation' contains what I preach to our people again and again. Your 'Modern Principles' with but one grand exception are the principles which govern my thought. The longer I think, the more firmly it has become fixed in my mind. I still continue to believe that your declaration that Roman ecclesiasticism is the legitimate result of the growth of Christian plantings, is baseless. As reasonably could you say that the muddy stream flowing by the City of New Orleans and the clear fountain springing out of the earth at the source of the Mississippi are identical. The crystal water of Itasco lake is in the turbid flood which washes the levees of Louisiana, but the pure liquid is not the filthy mud. As reasonably could you make the Buddhism of Tartary the same as that of the glorified Sakya Muni. My dear friend, you war against a legitimate foe, but you can not, as you fancy, trace in his lineaments the features of the blessed man of Judaea. You and he are soul to soul in the Holy War which you so sadly misunderstand."

"My library is far better stocked with so-called Liberal books than any theological library in this vicinity, and I occasionally lend the ministers books that they are eager to read, but not eager to have their flocks read. I mention this to give point to what I have to say, namely: that I value your INDEX above anything that comes to my house. I have the Radical, seven volumes entire, and I take the Examiner, edited by that noble specimen of a clergyman, Mr. Towne. But your weekly fills a niche that no monthly can fill. We poor mortals want a cheering word now and then, and as men of my sort get only kicks in the churches, we find comfort in your INDEX."

"If I had time this morning, I would take exception to some things you do and say. I am more and more convinced that you have not yet found the highway upon which religion shall travel. I am as much disgusted as you can be at some things said and done by some Unitarians, but not more than I am by many things done in the name of Free Religion."

"Shall you not put in some form for separate circulation your three discourses on the 'Relation of Christianity to Civilization'? Indeed, all your discourses bearing upon Christianity and Free Religion ought to go into book form, as you must be aware. It will form the new 'Body of Divinity' for the world's need."

"Please send me another copy of THE INDEX bearing date of June 17. The sermon on 'Love and Justice' I read aloud to a select audience of ten persons (one a blue Presbyterian), and all endorsed it. I think I have got you a new subscriber in —."

"I am a farmer by occupation; and by the orthodox profession I am considered an infidel on religious subjects. But that does not prevent the grass from growing, nor relieve me from suffering the penalties of violated law."

"I have not seen your paper; but being in earnest sympathy with the avowed spirit in which it is published, I would like to take it a short time and learn what kind of a paper it is."

"I am trying to increase your list of names, but this is a community where church dogmas stand for Religion, and Superstition dies hard. However, I don't quite despair."

Poetry,

I REMEMBER.

I remember, I remember
The fir-trees dark and high;
I used to think their slender tops
Were close against the sky.
It was a childish ignorance,
But now 'tis little joy
To know I'm further off from heaven
Than when I was a boy.

CHINA AND CHRISTIANITY.

Christianity was introduced into China by the Nestorians in the seventh century, but died out before the fifteenth. In the sixteenth century the Jesuits introduced it again, and numbered many nominal proselytes. Protestant missionaries entered the field at a later period, but about a dozen years ago had made less than a thousand converts. The conversion of China to Christianity, however, is a great object of ambition with Catholics and Protestants alike; and various have been the means devised to accomplish it.

Commerce with European nations was permitted by the Chinese authorities in various places, after the discovery of the route to India by the Cape of Good Hope; but the new Mantchu dynasty restricted it in the seventeenth century to the single port of Canton. Owing to the system of smuggling and the illicit trade in opium practised by the English from 1834, an imperial edict was issued in 1840 prohibiting all trade with England forever. This decree was followed by the English war of 1840-42 and the treaty of Nankin, by which China was compelled to open five great ports to foreign traffic. To the benefits of this treaty the United States were admitted in 1845.

Prior to 1858 all foreigners were rigorously confined to these five ports. Great Britain and France, in 1857, compelled by war the ratification of the treaties of Tientsin on June 18, 1858. Article XXIX of that made with the United States is as follows:—"The principles of the Christian religion, as professed by the Protestant and Roman Catholic Churches, are recognized as teaching men to do good, and to do to others as they would have men do to them. Hereafter those who quietly profess and teach these doctrines shall not be harassed or persecuted on account of their faith. Any persons, whether citizens of the United States or Chinese converts, who, according to their tenets, shall peaceably teach and practise the principles of Christianity, shall in no case be interfered with or molested."

Thus China was compelled by force of arms to tolerate Christianity and Christian missionaries,—a step not due at all to respect for or friendly feeling towards the religion itself. In 1868, Mr. Burlingame concluded with China a new treaty entitled "Additional Articles to the Treaty of 1858," which, contrary to the popular belief, simply reiterated its provisions, and conceded no new privilege to the United States or to any of its citizens.

But in 1867, 1868, and 1869, popular attacks upon foreigners became frequent and alarming, and especially upon the missionaries and their converts. In 1870 occurred the terrible massacre of Tien-tsin. A strong Chinese feeling against Christianity has thus manifested itself, which, as illustrated by the article we copied last week from a Shanghai paper, has had its root in indignation at the treatment received from Christian nations, especially through the enforced opium and coolie traffic. A letter from Rev. John L. Nevius, dated Tung-chow, May 29, 1871, and published a few weeks ago in the New York Observer, describes this feeling as very intense and dangerous, and mentions the general distribution of pamphlets throughout the empire "containing the most abominable lies about foreigners, and not obscurely suggesting their extermination."

So strong has this anti-Christian sentiment become, that the Chinese government recently issued a circular, enclosed in a note from the Ministers of the Chinese Board of Foreign Affairs at Peking to the Swedish Royal Commissioner, which is so remarkable that we subjoin long extracts from it, using the translation which was made of it in the London Times:—

"From the first introduction of the Roman Catholic (Tien-chu) religion into China, the missionaries have always been well educated, and the converts have, for the most part, been known as very peaceable; but ever since the treaties were signed, the converts have almost invariably been vicious and malevolent. The people, therefore, regard this religion for making men good with anything but satisfaction.

"Again, the converts take advantage of the influence of the missionaries to do harm to and oppress the common people, which they will not submit to.

"Moreover, when any litigation or case arises between the people and the converts which the local authorities proceed to deal with, the missionaries follow after and support the converts, thus obstructing the authorities, which the people strongly object to.

"Besides, when turbulent or lawless persons of any kind enter the religion, they use the influence thus acquired to foment disturbances, and this stirs up deep resentment in the people, which gathers until it becomes hatred, and hatred revenge.

"The people do not know that the Protestant and the Roman Catholic sects are separate, and call both the 'Tien-chu' religion; nor do they know the difference between the several nations of the West, but consider all as 'foreigners;' so when a disturbance arises, all persons, of whatever nationality they may be, that are residing in China, are equally in great danger. Even in the provinces that are quiet, the greater part of the inhabitants are full of ill-feeling. Under such circumstances, how can excitement and riot be avoided?

"The Prince and the Ministers have now investigated the whole question, for they greatly desire friendly relations between China and foreign countries, so that they may be on good terms forever. They cannot possibly help deciding well upon some course of action.

"But still the Western nations have missionaries living in one another's countries, and there has always been good feeling. The cause must be good regulation, whereby neither missionaries nor converts can foment disturbances. Now the Prince and the Ministers hear that, when missionaries of no matter what nationality go and live in another country, the practice is for them to submit to the laws of that country—they are not allowed to be ruled by their own. Should they disregard the laws or the orders of the officials of that country and overstep their proper spheres, or damage men's reputations, or in any way injure or harm persons, so that good feeling is destroyed and resentment and hatred called forth, or if they offend against the laws in any way, there are severe penalties to punish them by.

"Now order would be preserved and good feeling would last forever; there would be no pulling down of chapels or driving away of religions in China, if, when about to build a chapel or teach religion, it was first ascertained that the local officials and people were not opposed, and that there was unanimity between the two parties; and if the missionaries would let every one see clearly what they do, and that it is not at variance with the religion (they teach); also, if they would not do just as their converts direct them, meddling with the official business of the local authorities, and making use of their influence forcibly to harm (the people), thus calling down the hatred of the gentry and common people. If the missionaries would act in this way, as mentioned, the people would be friendly with them, and the officials would be able to protect them."

Some of the influences which have helped to make Christian converts of the Chinese are here betrayed. The missionaries, it seems, befriend their followers in the courts to the obstruction of justice. The converts take advantage of their influence to "oppress the common people." "Lawless and turbulent persons," it appears, profess the new religion,—which they would not do but for some objects of their own to be gained thereby. These, to be sure, are Chinese representations of the matter, upon which Christendom will look with suspicion or disbelief. But we see no reason why the Chinese view of the matter is not entitled to as much respect as any other. The tone of the above extracts is calm and fair; and its remedial suggestions strike us as eminently just. We cannot escape the inference, based on the above document, that the missionaries are sometimes, perhaps frequently, led into offensive and indefensible conduct by their proselytizing zeal. The strong arm of Europe gives them protection, and clothes them with power which it is more than likely they abuse. If they do not abuse it, they desert the priestly precedents of all ages.

Now how is this reasonable demand on the part of the Chinese government for restrictions on the mischief-making power of the missionaries met by the Christian public? Let us see.

The "Lord Bishop of the British Colony of Victoria, in Australia," recently lectured in San Francisco, stating that the Chinese imperial government is making a strong effort to rid the country of Christian missionaries; and he hoped that America and Great Britain would "soon teach China better." What have we here but a new would-be Peter the Hermit, doing his malignant best to stir up a bloody crusade against China, for the sake of the Christian religion? Is the American government, which is no more Christian than that of China, to join in forcing Christianity into China at the point of the bayonet? That is the plain English of the Bishop's demand. Mahomet, with the Koran in one hand and the scimitar in the other, did no worse. He who thinks modern Christianity one whit less sanguinary in its spirit than it was in the days of the Duke of Alva, is so simple as to fancy that a tiger can be made over into a lamb by merely pulling his teeth.

"Extravagant and bitter prejudice!" some of our readers may exclaim; "why show this harsh temper against the Christian religion? Such utterances as you quote are only the bigoted fumings of an angry priest."

Nay, not so. Is the New York Nation an angry priest? Yet, in an article on the demands of the above circular of the Chinese government, the issue of that ordinarily cold-blooded paper for August 17th says:

"What is the duty of our own Government under these circumstances? The United States cannot in general be engaged in religious propaganda; but as we have twice stipulated for the toleration of Christianity and the protection of Christian teachers and converts, we are estopped from denying the propriety of a further protection. There are, however, reasons of state policy why the Government should act in a quick, decided and peremptory manner. The repudiated stipulation is the key of the whole position. Its rejection is a return to the old system of absolute exclusion in all things; this is the first step, an experiment, perhaps, and, if successful, the others will surely and speedily follow. If we yield upon this point, the whole fabric of treaties, raised with so much labor, and at the cost of not a little blood, will fall like a house of cards. We do not urge action simply in the interest of religious Missions; we urge it in the interests of commerce and of civilization. There should be no weak hesitation in the use of force. The events of the past twelve years prove beyond a doubt that diplomatic negotiation will accomplish nothing. Neither America nor Europe can again be amused or deceived by another Burlingame embassy. The United States and the other great powers should unite in a demand, accompanied by a sufficient display of force, that the Chinese Government shall recede from its present position, shall reaffirm the violated treaties, and shall give ample reparation for past and security against future outrages. Unless this demand is complied with at once, China must be taught, in such a manner that the lesson cannot be forgotten, the advantages of preserving international faith."

The words we have italicised in this passage are neither more nor less than a call for war—in the name of commerce, civilization, AND CHRISTIANITY. We Americans, who suffer a gang of ruffianly boys in San Francisco to stone a poor Chinaman to death on the public street, and then, by the mouth of Judge Sawyer, declare that prosecution "would be useless, as he should hold that under the laws of California a Chinaman could not testify in the courts,"—we virtuous Americans, who thus look calmly on at the devilish murder of a poor, defenceless Chinaman, and let the murderers go unwhipped of justice, we, forsooth, must go to war, and slaughter thousands upon thousands more of China's helpless sons, lest they be deprived of the great salvation of our Christianity! The very stones cry shame on our hypocrisy. If we must have a war, let it be on that bloody mob of San Francisco.

What business is it of ours to meddle with China's home government—least of all with her religion? In that wicked instigation of the Nation to a new crusade in behalf of the blood-soaked "gospel of Christ," we hear the mingled cries of cupidity and bigotry—the low whine of avarice begging for Chinese gold, and the hoarse roar of fanaticism hungry for its prey. What worse outrage than for one nation to burst open the doors of another nation, with an invoice of goods in one hand and a pistol in the other? "Commerce and religious missions!" We like the Bishop's undiluted bigotry better, without this disgusting compound of greed and sanctity. When John Smith breaks into John Brown's house, insists on living there that he may trade with the servants, shoots John Brown's son for resistance, and with a butcher-knife at John Brown's throat extorts his consent to a "treaty" guaranteeing his rough boarder's right to preach the gospel in his family at all hours of the day and night,—what have we but a parable of the history of China's relations with Christendom? Shame on the man, be he priest or editor, who urges on the bully, and instigates horrible war for the sake of any religion on the face of the earth! If that be Christianity, it is the veriest devil-worship.

Of all the dire delusions that ever drenched a world with blood, the superstition of "salvation by Christ alone" is the reddest. It is time the human race were freed from it forever. The proposition to force this superstition on China by war is black with wickedness. If China repents, under the stress of bitter experience, her consent to the missionary treaty-clause, cancel it. What right have we to enforce it, or to shed one drop of blood in its enforcement? The proposal to enforce it is one more of those artful and dangerous attempts to commit the United States to the Christian religion. Again and again we say—beware of these beginnings of evil!

DR. CHANNING'S LAST WORDS.

"I am more and more inclined to believe in his simple humanity." These are the last recorded words of Dr. Channing (as far as I know) in regard to Jesus Christ. The remark was made during the last year of Dr. Channing's life to his only son, who repeated it to me. I wrote it down from his lips.

I think no one ever read the memoir of this remarkable man, without noticing that he seemed to grow younger as he grew older. In the first volume, he seems like what the early Puritans called "a truly aged young man;" in the second volume he grows more youthful; in the third he seems fresh, ardent, hopeful, fearless, radical. But even in that third volume I remember nothing which puts him so in advance of the current thought around him as these words. In his last year of life and in his last illness the cloud of early education seems to have cleared finally away, and he was at least "more and more inclined to believe" in the simple truth.

It must have made him happy. Nothing, it seems to me, can simplify life so much and make the path of duty so accessible and easy, as when the superstitions of theology fall aside, and we say of Jesus—"This also was a man." Till then, his example is of little value; its true value dates from the time when we see him to be of our own race. Emerson says truly:—"The assumption that the age of inspiration is past, that the Bible is closed, the fear of degrading the character of Jesus by representing him as a man, indicate with sufficient clearness the falsehood of our theology." I never can be sufficiently grateful to Emerson for this grand sentence, which at once crystallized into clearness what was vague in my own mind more than twenty years ago. And I believe that every one will be likely to take a more healthful and hopeful view of human life in proportion as he recognizes "the simple humanity of Jesus."

Be this as it may, it will be admitted by all that this belief, if true, is destined utterly to transform the religious organizations and worship of Christendom. The change produced by the Protestantism of Luther was nothing in comparison. When one has once made up his mind that Jesus was a man, the conviction becomes a test by which to try all contemporary thinkers; and all that is called "theology" loses its interest so soon as it denies or evades this simple touchstone. One can thenceforward care no more for the details of existing creeds and rituals than one cares for the details of architecture on a bridge that is just dislodged by a freshet. So long as a human being clings to any fragment of it, there is interest in helping him; that is all.

A small supplement is issued with this number of THE INDEX, which we hope will be used by all who are earnestly its friends in soliciting subscriptions to the stock of the Index Association. If you cannot take a share yourself, get the signature of some one who can on the fourth page of this supplement, and return it to THE INDEX. Ladies are especially efficient in such work. Any one desirous of extra copies to send to friends at a distance will be cheerfully furnished with them on simple application. If all who really sympathize with us will take a little trouble now, they can raise the entire sum required within a week. There are many radicals everywhere who would willingly take a share, if the project were fairly presented to them by some personal friend. Now is the time for action.

"The wisdom of the foolish," writes a friendly Western farmer to us in an article too long for publication, "is by far more acceptable to God than the prejudices of the wise." There is much to think of in those pregnant words. We are all wise, of course. Then it concerns us to ferret out and strangle our prejudices, our anxiety to do this being a good measure of our wisdom. The "wise" man who can discover none at all in himself is either a greater sage than Socrates, who was prejudiced against the Sophists, —a greater saint than Jesus, who was prejudiced against the Pharisees,—or a greater fool than the John Bull who said: "I am not a prejudiced man, but damn a Frenchman!"

The root of moral courage is a conscience at peace with itself.

THEORETICAL—PRACTICAL.

The aggressive side of the Free Religious movement is chiefly indicated by its war against sectarianism and superstition. The dominant theology of the Church is assailed with merciless criticism and vigorous denunciation. Rationalists are apt to trace the barbarisms which yet degrade our civilization to our low conception of Deity; to the doctrines of original sin, vicarious atonement and the resurrection of the body—in short, to the church creed. It is impossible, they say, for men to think of God as some dreadful Spirit of vengeance and of man as his wretched victim, and at the same time to cultivate self-respect, personal integrity, and the social virtues essential to a perfect society.

The argument is a good one, and the crusade, if I may so term it, is necessary. The tyranny of theology must be overcome, and the power of the church thereby destroyed, before we can look for those social, civil, and political conditions which are the out-growth of a high intelligence and keen moral preception. The danger which besets us is to be found in a too general readiness to repress this spirit of aggression. Aggression leads to controversy; conflict engenders personalities; and personalities are vulgar. Then, too, it is very comfortable for one to feel that he deals with principles rather than men, with ideas instead of institutions. The consciences of some of our ablest and best men are duped into silence by this reflection.

I have said that the aggressive character of the Free Religious movement finds expression in opposition to the Church. I might add that it is almost limited to it; and here we have at least a partial solution of the indifference to the movement manifested by thousands of men and women who were long ago emancipated from the church. They say:—"We agree with you, but the church is already doomed; science has killed it; we are busy with practical questions and living issues." Their statement may be too sweeping, but it is none the less suggestive, and we cannot afford to disregard it. Free Religion implies much more than freedom from sect and superstition. It demands an individual character in harmony with enlightened intellectual convictions; and having secured this, it forces the individual to a participation in the affairs of life that have a practical, direct bearing upon the public weal—into politics, for example.

The present gubernatorial contest in Massachusetts furnishes a good illustration of my thought. The leaders of the Republican party of this state, by indifference to the wishes of the people, have created a necessity for a new party. A bold, bad man seizes the opportunity to secure his own political advancement. He proclaims himself the champion of reform, and talks of Labor and Capital, prohibition liquor laws, and woman suffrage. These are the questions pressing for settlement, and, were he a different type of man, he could carry the people with him. Friends and opponents agree in their appreciation of his character. He is pronounced liar and demagogue by men who will vote for him as well as by those who wish to defeat him. Remove all opposition based upon fear and detestation of the man, and his triumph will be an easy one. As it is, men say:—"We prefer to wait for the reforms; we will not humiliate the state by honoring Butler."

This demand for personal integrity is a most cheering sign; it indicates the power of religion in the community—not of organized sects, but of a free religion that makes a man of the individual and creates a social and political honesty beside which unscrupulous men, however able or plausible, cannot prosper.

If religion implies on the part of the individual an active interest in practical matters, it also invests associations that rightly take its name, with similar duties and responsibilities. Questions now classified under the head of "Social Science" will not be adequately treated until the religious spirit is infused into them. The Church by her theory of religion is compelled to exclude them. Free Religious associations must welcome them, if they will be true to their inspiration.

That I may not be misunderstood, let me say, it is not necessary to decry speculation in order to advocate investigation; nor is it wise to disparage theoretical treatment in our desire for practical work. This is the mistake made by many worthy people, and especially by the class of reformers previously referred to. It will be profitable, however, to heed their criticism. Our lecturers and essayists, our local assemblies and larger conventions, should devote more time than has hitherto been given, to the consideration of subjects which bear closely upon our social relations and every-day life.

If this suggestion is adopted, we shall soon observe a development of the aggressive spirit, and with it a marked increase of interest on the part of many at whose indifference we now marvel. It is safe to say that the full meaning and value of the Free Religious movement will not be developed until the organizations which are its product learn to apply the spirit of Liberty, which is its essence, to the practical problems that now engage the attention of mankind.

THE "INCARNATE SNEER."

Boston, Sept. 21, 1871.

EDITOR OF INDEX:—The following letter was sent to the New York Nation and refused publication. Inasmuch as hardly any number of that journal issues without stating very freely its mind that somebody or other is base or conceited or otherwise blameworthy, the editor would do well to emulate a little of that fairness in giving a voice to criticisms upon itself which has won for THE INDEX an enviable reputation. Not believing, however, that the Nation would show this magnanimity—arrogant persons hardly ever do—I retained a copy purposely to send to you, thinking that the importance of the topic at which the Nation sneered would justify its publication.

Respectfully,

J. V. B.

Boston, Aug. 10, 1871.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

Sir,—In your issue of Aug. 10, speaking of the controversy in Cincinnati (which you call a "squabble") about the Sunday laws, you make the following remark:

"And meantime as the people usually display the practical sense of making the law such as to satisfy the religious world, and of interpreting it, or neglecting to enforce it, in such a way as to satisfy the vast majority of the less religious part of the community, everybody may well be reasonably content, and not stand out for the formal logical correctness of the thing."

Here, if I rightly comprehend it, is taught a course which I beg frankly to call, as it appears to me, one of remarkable duplicity and meanness, which no "practical sense" (the synonyme, I presume, for the test of expediency to which you continually appeal) can make otherwise than harmful and degrading. Am I unjust in analyzing the sentence as follows? The people, it is said, display practical sense in so legislating as to satisfy the religious world and by so interpreting or neglecting the law as to satisfy the less religious part of the community. But it is evident that the religious world and the less religious part of the community do themselves constitute the people, and the whole people. Therefore the doctrine in question means—

1. That the religious part, as religious, may and do demand and require a law, but, as a part of the people, connive at an evasive interpretation or non-enforcement by way of compromise; which is cowardly and dishonest.

2. That the religious part, as religious, demand and require a law upon moral grounds, but, as part of the people, connive at its nullification by way of concession to the satisfaction of that very party which, by the law, they style wrong and injurious; which is cowardly and dishonest.

3. That the less religious (in the sense of the indifferent) perform properly their duties as citizens, when they yield a statute of whose influence they take no thought to a demand which they either despise or misunderstand, on condition that it shall not be enforced to their inconvenience; which is selfish, unfaithful, and dishonest.

4. That the less religious (in the sense of the intelligently opposed) "may well be reasonably content" to allow a law which they believe to be superstitious in substance and pernicious in tendency, provided its upholders will wink equally at its evasion or neglect; which is cowardly and dishonest.

5. That it is "practical sense" to degrade the law and lessen the sense of its sanctity in the community by blinking its actual nullification, or making it in any case a mere rostrum whence one party is privileged to announce its ideas of what is right in principle, in virtue of a tacit bargain, which defines otherwise the course actually to be followed.

Whether I belong to that class of thinkers whom you are never weary of ridiculing as sentimentalists, I will not undertake to say. I believe in principle, and I think it probable that the Nation is as much liable to bias and as little able to state the origin of its bias, as the advocates of opinions that displease it. But I certainly do not count myself with a certain kind of Radicals, vain-glorious just now, whom I am accustomed to call the hurraing and hilarious kind; and there is a certain calm, judicial tone in the Nation which is eminently comforting to my mind. Yet I am among that large number of your admirers who think that the Nation exhibits a self-congratulatory consciousness of its own merits to a degree perplexing to those who believe that modesty and deference are tasteful and becoming as well in the editorial column as in the private home.

I make this remark because your readers may very properly be offended at the cold and lofty sneers you are accustomed to mete out to whatever happens to strike you as an unimportant matter, however earnest may be those who are interested in it. You cannot be ignorant of the length and breadth of the movement which has been and still is agitating the country upon the Sunday question. But even if that question were just lifting its head in one obscure place, it would still be untrue, contemptuous and injurious to call such a controversy a "squabble." I take the liberty to subjoin Miss Cobbe's remark in the August number of the Fortnightly Review concerning Mephistopheles. Miss Cobbe says that the poet "foresaw that, at least for the current century, not Cruelty, not Malice, not Falsehood, not Pride, would be the greatest evil of the world, but—the Incarnate Snear."

CONFUCIAN CLASSICS.

Evermore brave souls in all the ages
Climb the heights that hide the coming day;
Evermore they cry, these seers and sages,
From their cloud—"Our doctrines make no way.

"All too high we stand above the nations,
Sending forth our thoughts in tones sublime,
Shouting downward our interpretations
Of each wondrous secret born of Time.

To the level of life's human tide,
Hand with hand, and heart with warm heart blending,
We will float upon its ocean wide."

Stay no longer on the heights, O Teacher!
Truth has lowly channels manifold,
And the Man pleads better than the Preacher—
Words without the breath are very cold.

METHODIST MISSIONS.

BROOKFIELD, Mass., Sept. 6, 1871.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

It appears from a late editorial that you have not much confidence in Christian Missions. In reply permit me to say:

1. Many weeks ago I sent you a statement to this effect, that, so far from its taking 300 per cent. of our missionary collections to run our machinery, or get the money to the heathen, it did not, in the Methodist Episcopal Church, take on an average anything like a hundredth part of that. Upon inquiry at headquarters, I learn that "the expense of administering the missionary funds of the M. E. Church approaches three per cent." Now unless the foregoing correction is published, it seems to me your misstatement will amount to positive misrepresentation.

2. If you will allow me the space, I will prove in your own columns (just where the evidence is needed) that, to say nothing of the conversion of the heathen, the indirect and secular advantages to our civilization of the missionary work vastly more than counterbalances all its pecuniary expenditures. So long as this challenge remains unaccepted, no more such charges against this great work as appear in a late INDEX can honorably be made.

3. Would it not look well for Free Religionists, permit me with all due respect to suggest, instead of thus carping and snarling bitterly and contemptuously at those who are diligently attempting to bless and enlighten all nations, first to equal their zeal in the same direction—display the same earnestness in labors for the salvation of humanity?

R. H. HOWARD.

[1. We cheerfully print Mr. Howard's note, and refer to the lecture on our first page for remarks on the general subject. His statement that it only takes three per cent. to administer the missionary funds of the M. E. Church is so evidently based on a false view of the matter that it seemed to us not entitled to much consideration. It evidently takes into account only the expenses of the home office of missionary operations; and our lecture gives good reasons for not thus restricting the field of calculation.

2. Evidences as to the civilizing tendency of missions are not to the point in this discussion. It is their Christianizing tendency that is under debate; for Christianization, not civilization, is the avowed object of missions. We decline to regard these two objects as identical. So far as missions really civilize savages, we wish them heartily well; but this sort of work is, on Christian principles, purely incidental and subsidiary. Further, we decline to allow missions to monopolize the credit which belongs to general causes, or exclusively to claim the honor of civilizing barbarous nations when commerce and general contact with civilized nations are entitled to the lion's share of such honor. If Mr. Howard is disposed to stick to the point, and show the bearing of specific Christian beliefs on civilization, we are willing to allow him a reasonable amount of space in these columns for the purpose. But we do not feel called upon to give much space to aimless and desultory discussion on the subject.

3. The insinuation that "Free Religionists" do less than Christians for the welfare of mankind does no great credit to Mr. Howard's knowledge of facts,—not to say his "Christian humility." If he will carefully study the relative amounts of money contributed by "believers" and "unbelievers" to the various philanthropic objects of the day, he will exercise more caution hereafter in making such "suggestions" as the above. The fact that modern liberals choose better and more sensible methods of helping their fellow-men than that of "converting them to Christianity" has quite blinded Mr. Howard's eyes to the noble work they do, and the noble spirit they manifest. One such name as that of Gerrit Smith is a sufficient answer to his charge. He is probably quite unaware of the pharisaic tone of his own "suggestion."—Ed.]

A LEGAL OUTRAGE.

SNOWVILLE, Va., Sept. 6, 1871.

FRIEND ABBOT:—

In THE INDEX which I received yesterday I find the question asked, with the reply following, namely:—"Would you know what God is? Do a noble act when it costs." Now if I have done a noble act, not thinking at all of God, but of the good of my fellow-beings, and it costs me every dollar I can raise, and more than I have or can borrow, will it help me to know God any better than I now know him, or have known for years past? I will illustrate my meaning by saying I have been a reader of all the reform books and papers that I could obtain for years past, and at the same time a searcher for God, or truth, as best I could.

In the year 1840, when a youth, I got Miller's book upon the "End of All Things," and read it, to learn, if possible, whether Jesus was coming or not. I next joined the Methodists, and from them got all the information I could. Afterwards I got all the Universalist books, and read them, with all the truths of Father Ballou. In 1849, I procured and read the first book on Rochester rappings, and have ever continued to get and read all the Spiritualist books and papers, and used my best exertions and influence to give them a good circulation for the benefit of humanity. When THE INDEX was started, I was among the first to find it out, and send on for it, and have done all I could to get the people to read and think for themselves like free men. Now what is the result? I sent you some weeks ago a specimen of our Virginia laws, and also the notice served upon by the Assessor, a Methodist preacher, and also a candidate for the Legislature. On the 29th August, I applied to the Judge of this district to grant me a free license, on the ground that THE INDEX was a religious paper, and that the R. P. Journal also was a religious paper. I gave my own testimony (without kissing "the book") that they were religious papers, and got one of the Stewards of the Methodist Church to give the same testimony and corroborate my statement, adding that he could pronounce them as religious as the Baltimore Episcopal Methodist or the Westminster Confession of Faith; but the Judge and Assessor decided that they were not religious, and now I shall be forced to pay $10.75, when I have not 75 cents in my pocket. I have worked and paid out my money (when I had it) in a "noble" cause, and you know that it does "cost." Now what am I seeing, God or ignorant and superstitious tyranny? Would it have been any worse for me, or for the free thought of others, if it had been a Catholic Assessor and Judge? And if such bigots can get the Constitution so changed as to recognize one particular system of religion, the Catholics will certainly stand a chance under the same law to judge, condemn, and oppress those, and all such, as have judged, condemned and oppressed me.

Will the gods save the Methodists and Presbyterians of Montgomery Co., Va., in preference to all other people on earth? I am perfectly willing to wait a few years more and abide the result.

P. O. Address—Rev. J. M. BARNES.

Snowville, Pulaski Co., Va.

[If our friend, whose persecution and unjust fine show that Virginia may well compete with Lower Illinois for the name "Egypt," has the interior consciousness of a noble act, he has what neither the Judge nor the Assessor can confiscate. It is to this he should look, rather than to the poor, bigotry and tyranny of man, for the knowledge at which we hinted. If a good conscience throws no light on the Divine, we know not where to look for it. And we doubt not, with this explanation, our self-sacrificing friend will see more meaning than before in our little aphorism.

The intolerance of Virginia legislation, which fines an honest man for circulating liberal papers while it gives a free license to the vendors of Evangelical papers, ought to be exposed; and we append the statute by which this gross injustice is done. We wish we were able to repay Mr. Barnes the $10.75 of which he has been legally robbed. His dealings with us have proved him to be a very worthy man, whose word is as good as gold. Here is the law:—

Acts and joint resolutions passed by the General Assembly of Virginia at its session of 1870-'71.

SCHEDULE A, No 107: BOOK AGENTS.—Any person who shall receive subscriptions for or shall in any manner furnish newspapers, books, maps, prints, pamphlets, or periodicals, otherwise than by sale, printed or published beyond the limits of this state, shall be deemed to be a book agent. Any person desiring to distribute or sell any religious books, newspapers, pamphlets, or periodicals, may apply to the judge of the court of the county or corporation in which he may desire to distribute or sell the same; and such a judge, upon being satisfied that the person applying is of fit character and a proper person in whom to confide the trust of selling or distributing such books, may direct the assessor or commissioner to grant him a license with nominal tax only. Any person violating the provisions of this section shall pay a fine of not less than fifty dollars nor more than one hundred dollars for each offence.

VIRGINIA, MONTGOMERY Co. To wit—I hereby certify that I shall this day assess a license-tax, imposed by law on James M. Barnes, to be ten dollars, for the privilege of circulating papers, from the 1st day of May, 1871, to the 30th of April, 1872. Under my hand, this 4th of August, 1871. Fee 75 cts.

MADISON V. SMITH, A. S. A.

PROGRESS OF FREE THOUGHT IN SCOTLAND.

[From the graduation ("Commencement") address of Professor Bennett, at the University of Edinburgh.]

"At the congress of naturalists and medical men held at Innsbruck in 1869, Helmholtz claimed for Germany the principal agency in the progress of modern science. She owes this superiority, he said, to the boldness of her savans in propagating truth, whilst he asserted that in England and France they dare not do so openly, for fear of compromising their social interests. But I trust the time is past, even in Scotland, when scientific truth has anything to fear from superstitious bigotry or clerical intolerance. It is true that we are constantly hearing that there is a tendency to place new scientific doctrines in opposition to religious beliefs. But I would suggest that the cause of this is not that scientific men are irreligious, so much as that religious men are unscientific. It is utterly impossible, in these days, to oppose the most obvious facts, or persecute the great discoverers of the day, because the writers of the Old and New Testament, 1,800 or 3,000 years ago, knew little of astronomy, chemistry, and physics. Such, however, has been the unfortunate policy of the Church for many centuries. I need not remind you that the great Galileo died a prisoner of the Inquisition, and that Servetus was publicly burnt in Geneva, by the authority of Calvin. The true cause, unquestionably, of the present chasm in thought which divides the literary and religious from scientific men is, that the former have been bred up in ignorance of physiology, that is, of all that relates to their own bodily structure, functions, and requirements. Unfortunately, their education causes in them a want of appreciation and an incapacity of comprehending scientific truths. . . . Clergymen and most religious teachers are totally insensible to the errors and discrepancies of language they use in the pulpit; so that, when the scientific man takes his place in church, he is surprised at the manifest ignorance of established truths constantly preached to the people."—"Nature," (London).

CLERICAL HUMBUGS.—I often wonder, when I hear the compliments paid to the clergy, how much of it is sincere, and what at home in your private hearts you think, on the whole, of the profession. An acquaintance of mine, a clergyman in a certain city which shall be nameless, called once on a parishioner who he had reason to suppose had a very friendly disposition towards himself in particular and towards the profession in general; he was ushered into the drawing-room, the master of the house not having yet arrived, and found a little girl, the daughter of the family, about seven years old, to whom he at once addressed himself. "Well, Alice, do you know me?" "Yes, you are the minister. Ministers are humbugs; my pa says so." "O, but, Alice, my dear, they are not all humbugs." "Yes they are too; pa says so." I think the statement was a little too absolute. The position may be true in the main, but I think it needs some qualification. A clerical humbug, I conceive, is a minister who expects from his profession what he could not gain from his character as an individual.—Dr. Hedge.

By the decease of Mr. Grote, University College (London) gains an endowment for a Chair of Moral Philosophy; but with the historian's bequest of £6,000 is associated the condition that, if the chair is ever held by a clergyman, the payment of the stipend shall be stopped. Not one penny is the reverend professor to receive; but all the accumulated dividends are to be handed over to his successor, who, of course, must be a layman.

INDEX TRACTS

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION have published the following tracts, and will publish others of a similar character, if encouraged to do so by the receipt of enough orders to cover the expense:—

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no able, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Fifteen copies One Dollar.

Also, the scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition by PARKER PILLSBURY, entitled "The Sunday Question," is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

Friends of Free Religion wishing to assist the publication of such tracts as these will please donate such sums as they think proper, which will be applied exclusively to this purpose. Address—

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, Toledo, Ohio

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is TWO DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Circulars with list of subjects will be sent on application.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

CHRISTIAN PROPAGANDISM.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, Sept. 24, 1871. Second Lecture.]

Hitherto I have confined my discussion of the missionary system to the proselytizing operations of Protestant Christendom, showing their great costliness and inadequacy in general as compared with the enormous work to be done. Before speaking of the local results achieved by the missionary system as a whole in various parts of the world, something should be said about Christian propagandism as carried on by the Roman Catholic Church. I regret that my statistics are very meagre, especially as to the actual number of conversions effected by Catholic missionaries; but nevertheless it is possible, even without this information, to arrive at some important conclusions concerning the character and extent of their work.

Passing over the missionary efforts which led the various nations of Christendom to embrace the religion they now nominally profess, I shall briefly consider the work of Catholic missions as carried on in more recent times. The great loss inflicted on the Catholic Church at the time of the so-called Reformation stimulated the Roman hierarchy to great exertions among the heathen, in order to recover their power by new accessions to their spiritual empire. In this endeavor the Jesuits took the lead, and established flourishing missions in many parts of the world. In 1662, Pope Gregory XV founded the Collegium de Fide Propaganda, but I have no statistical information concerning its operations. The eighteenth century, however, witnessed a great decline in the influence of Catholic missions. In 1822, the "Institution for the Propagation of the Faith" was founded at Lyons, and has been sustained by the combined resources of the whole Catholic communion. The number of missionary bishops sustained by this Society in the year 1844 was 139, while the number of priests in the same year was 4,759; and the number of both has since greatly increased, undoubtedly far exceeding the 5,033 Protestant missionaries reported by Dr. Mullen. The receipts of this "Institution for the Propagation of the Faith" were over $800,000 for the year 1856; and it is a very significant fact that nearly one-third of this entire sum was expended on missions in the United States. Neither for China nor for India was any appropriation made comparable to that devoted to the conversion of the heathen Yankees! It is manifest, however, that the missionary operations of the Catholic Church can by no means be adequately known from these insufficient data; and I make no pretence of giving complete information on the subject.

One feature, however, of the Catholic missionary system is too remarkable to be passed by unnoticed. A great and predominant object of Catholic missionaries is the baptism of sick and dying infants, by which immediate admission to heaven is supposed to be secured. Dr. Perocheau, vicar-apostolic of Su-tchuen, in China, reported for 1844 more than 24,000 heathen infants as thus rescued from the flames of hell; while for 1848 he made a similar report of over 84,000. Absurd as this custom seems, it is the logical consequence of the Catholic theology; and it is impossible to doubt the sincerity of the men and women who give up their whole lives to the performance of this sacred duty. But the most singular part of the custom is the fact that most of these baptisms are effected by stealth. M. Fontaine, missionary-apostolic in Cochinchina, gives the following description of the manner in which these pagan babies have greatness thrust upon them:—

"In a village of which the Mayor is a Christian, there exists a house of nuns, whom his lordship (the bishop) sends out in different directions to look for these hapless children. They go generally two by two,—an old one and a young one; and while the elder one enters into conversation, the other, who in good manners should leave her to speak, draws near the mother, who is holding the sick child, or sits down near the mat on which it is left. She fondles it, takes it in her arms, and whilst she caresses it, she succeeds in dropping on its forehead a little water out of a bottle which she keeps concealed in her long wide sleeve."

Bishop Battaillon, vicar-apostolic of the South Sea Islands, makes confession of the same device with great self-complacency:—"I have always with me a flask of scented water and a flask of plain water. I begin with sprinkling a little of the scent on the head of the infant, under pretence of comforting the baby; and whilst the mother takes pleasure in spreading it over the baby's face, I dexterously change the flask and use the water which conveys regeneration without any suspicion being excited of the nature of the action."

So also Father de Bourges writes:—"When these children are in danger of death, our practice is to baptize them without asking the permission of their parents, which would certainly be refused. The Catechists and private Christians are well acquainted with the formula of baptism, and they confer it on these dying children under pretence of giving them medicines."

During a famine in the Carnatic about the year 1737, Father Tremblay wrote that twelve thousand children and upwards were baptized in this manner.

Occasionally, however, the zeal of the missionaries in baptizing sick infants without due caution has produced consequences disastrous to themselves and their cause. In the year 1668 a Jesuit mission was established on one of the Ladrone Islands by Father Servitores with five companions, who were at first received with great kindness. But the inhabitants noticed that the infants died shortly after being baptized, and, not being sufficiently skilled in logic to know that it is unsafe to infer causation from mere precedence in time, they fell into the natural mistake of taking the act of baptism as a mysterious style of murder. Filled with this notion, the mothers used to run away, and hide with their babies in the forests on the approach of a missionary. But the men took the supposed outrage in sterner fashion, and killed several of the holy fathers for their over-eagerness to baptize the babies. Among these martyrs to their own superstition and that of the savages combined, was Father Servitores himself, the founder of the mission; and the conversion of the natives was in definitely postponed.

It is manifest enough that such propagandism as this is of the most worthless kind. It accomplishes nothing, and leaves no results. Yet a large part of the missionary enthusiasm of the Catholics is expended on the baptism of dying infants. Could a more profitless object of expenditure be imagined? It is hard to say which superstition is the more childish and frivolous,—that of the heathen or that of their teachers. If the large conquests of the Catholic faith among the pagan nations of which we hear so much vague but confident boasting are composed of such victories as these, it is plain that, however Paradise above may be filled with these myriads of regenerated heathen babies, the earth is but little likely by this process to be made into a Paradise below. The utterly insignificant impression made by Protestant Christianity on the great hosts of the pagan world I have shown already by statistics whose accuracy can hardly be impugned; and the vast outlay of strength by the Catholic Church in securing the stealthy baptism of perishing heathen infants is the tacit confession of a "plentiful lack" of success with their parents. In the absence of positive information concerning the actual number of conversions made by the Catholic missionaries, this open and even exultant avowal of a method of conversion which depends on the baptism of dying infants without the knowledge of their parents compels the inference that a comparatively small number of adults are converted after all.

One of the most striking results of our comparison of the total number of Protestant converts with the totals of population in the chief countries of heathendom is that the greatest success has been achieved among isolated communities of savages. Countries in which a large population has attained independently a respectable degree of civilization are precisely those in which Protestant missionary success has been most meagre. On the Pacific islands, for instance, where a few thousands of savages are brought under missionary influences, the highest per cent. of conversions is reported; out of the 25,000,000 of Oceania, 48,249 were said to have become church-members. But in India, with its population of 130,000,000, only 19,370 were reckoned as church-members; while in China, with its 369,000,000, less than 1,000 were so reckoned. Yet it is the most populous countries which are necessarily the most important to be considered, when the conversion of the world to Christianity is proposed as the great object of effort. I have no doubt that the Catholics would report a far larger number of converts in these countries than the Protestants. Their religion is better calculated to make an impression on great populations already habituated to idolatrous worship; and the Roman Catholic organization, by its unity and unrivalled system of propagandism, enjoys advantages which are impossible to Protestant sects. Yet Catholics and Protestants combined, after centuries of unwearied exertion, have failed to convert more than an insignificant fraction of the great heathen populations. Christianity has already extended about as far as it will ever go. Its vigorous days are over. Henceforth it must stand on the defensive; and it will be fortunate if it continues to hold its own. Before Christendom can succeed in converting heathendom, it will itself have become dechristianized by the influence of modern science on its own superstitions. No one of the existing great religions of the world will ever succeed in swallowing up the rest; but I believe that a new, free, and cosmopolitan religion, based on fundamental human nature, and aiming solely at the truest and highest perfection of it, will eventually supplant them all.

The reasons for this non-success of Christianity in its great enterprise of converting the world are, of course, various and numerous. One of them is undoubtedly the want of harmony among Christians themselves. Not only is Christendom divided into three great churches, Catholic, Greek, and Protestant, but the latter is sub-divided into a vast number of more or less hostile sects. In fact, a vast proportion of the missionary enthusiasm of the Catholics and Protestants is directed, not to the conversion of the outside heathen, but to that of each other. The efforts of the Roman hierarchy to convert Protestant countries are tireless, and the sums they spend on this object are undoubtedly vast. On the other hand, the Protestants are just as eager to convert the Catholics. Rev. Dr. Hurst, translator of Hagenbach's "History of the Church in the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries," states in a supplementary note to that very valuable work [Vol. II, p. 458] that "one of the immediate and natural effects" of the unification of Italy under the sceptre of Victor Emanuel "has been to open it to Protestant evangelization." He estimates the number of evangelical Christians in Italy at 50,000, and asserts that Protestant missionaries are now laboring with great zeal in Venice, Verona, Mantua, Milan, Como, Turin, Genoa, Leghorn, Florence, Naples, and other places with great success. Dr. Hurst also states [Vol. II, p. 478] that the Spanish Revolution of October, 1868, by which Queen Isabella and the Bourbon dynasty were expelled from Spain, produced a similar effect in that country. "No sooner," he says, "was the Provisional Government established, than the Protestants on the Continent and in Great Britain gave indubitable evidence that they appreciated the magnitude of their new task." Among the evangelical organizations he mentions as pouring into Spain their missionary energies, are the American Bible Society, the American and Foreign Christian Union, the American Tract Society, and the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Thus it appears that our American missionary associations reckon Roman Catholics as among the "heathen" that need conversion—a fact which will oblige us to add from 150,000,000 to 200,000,000 to the number, already so enormous, of those that need salvation according to the Protestant gospel. When we thus see less than a tenth of the world's population boldly undertaking to convert the remaining nine-tenths, we may greatly admire their zeal and pluck, but can hardly commend their discretion. Their attempt reminds me of the pious old negro who, having declared that he would do at once whatever the Lord should command him, and being asked what he should do if the Lord commanded him to jump through a stone-wall, replied with great solemnity—"Brudder, if de Lord command dis chile to jump through a stone-wall, I will anyhow jump at it!"

The natural effect of this mutual hostility, however, among Christians themselves, has been to retard the growth of Christianity in the heathen countries. Especially the antagonism and mutual jealousy of the Catholics and Protestants have produced this result by bewildering the heathen mind as to what Christianity is. When Chao Phya Thipakon, the Siamese Minister of State, said to Dr. Gutzlaff—"They [the converts] continually pray to God, but, it seems, nothing happens according to their prayer,"—the missionary replied—"They are Roman Catholics, and hold an untrue religion; therefore God is not pleased with them." [Modern Buddhist, p. 33]. Thus both Catholics and Protestants, while professing to be Christians themselves, deny the Christian name to each other; for no staunch Catholic will concede a Protestant to be a Christian, and the Protestant missionary, at least, denies that a Catholic is one. The heathen are naturally bewildered, and conclude to let the whole religion alone.

But a more important reason for the non-success of Christianity in coping with such religions as Brahmanism, Buddhism, Confucianism, and so forth, is the fact that the heathen themselves discern no superiority in it. To a very great extent they are right. Chao Phya Thipakon justly contrasts the illiberality of Christian missionaries, in consigning all but their converts to hell, with the liberality of the Buddhists, who declare that all the good, of all beliefs, will be saved. "Even those," he says, "who do not believe in the religion of Buddha, by good actions acquire merit, and will on their death attain heaven; and by evil actions acquire demerit, and on death will pass to hell. Buddhism does not teach the necessary damnation of those who do not believe in Buddha; and in this respect I think it is more excellent than all the other religions which teach that all but their own followers will surely go to hell." [Modern Buddhist, p. 85].

Nor is it only in this one particular that Christianity manifests an inferiority to Buddhism. "Purity and impurity belong to oneself; no one can purify another,"—taught Buddha in the Dhammapada [Buddhaghosha's Parables, p. cv.] The Buddhists themselves are quite shrewd enough to apply this principle of the strictly personal nature of human character to the Christian doctrine of vicarious atonement. "How can it be," says this Siamese state-minister from whom I have already quoted, "according to the belief of those who believe in but one resurrection,—who believe in a man being received into heaven while his nature is still full of impurity, by virtue of sprinkling his head with water, or cutting off by circumcision a small piece of his skin? . . . We do know and can prove that men can purify their own natures, and we know the laws by which this purification can be effected. Is it not better to believe in this which we can see and know, than in that which has no reality to our perceptions?" [Modern Buddhist, p. 89.]

The concluding page and a half of the Modern Buddhist is so admirable a presentation by Mr. Alabaster of this part of my subject, that I cannot withstand the temptation to quote it entire:—

"Such are the ideas and arguments of an honest and earnest Buddhist of the present day, defending his religion against the assaults of the numerous body of missionaries who live in comfort and teach without molestation among his countrymen. He is indebted to them for much information, and willingly accepts it. He listens to and admires the morality of the Christian religion until they believe him almost a Christian, and then he tells them that Buddha, too, taught a morality as beautiful as theirs, and a charity that extends to everything that has breath. And when they speak of faith, he answers that, by the light of the knowledge that they have helped him to, he can weed out his old superstitions, but that he will accept no new ones. Their cause is, as the late king said, hopeless:—'You must not think that any of my party will ever become Christians. We will not embrace what we think a foolish religion.' The religion of Buddha meddled not with the Beginning, which it could not fathom; avoided the action of a Deity it could not perceive; and left open to endless discussion that problem which it could not solve, the ultimate reward of the perfect. It dealt with life as it found it; it declared all good which led to its sole object, the diminution of the misery of all sentient beings; it laid down rules of conduct which have never been surpassed, and held out reasonable hopes of a future of the most perfect happiness. Its proofs rest on the assumptions that the reason of man is his surest guide, and that the law of Nature is perfect justice. To the disproof of these assumptions, we recommend the attention of those missionaries who wish to convert Buddhists."

As shown by these very remarkable extracts, the greatest difficulty that Christianity meets with in attempting to propagate itself in the great heathen states, is its own intrinsic narrowness and unreasonableness. Until it can conquer these inherent defects, it can never conquer the world. But inasmuch as it cannot conquer them without ceasing to be Christianity, its hope of a universal conversion of mankind vanishes into thin air.

I have now shown the small numerical success of Christian propagandism in general, and touched upon one or two of the most important reasons for this ill-success. I will next consider the subject more in detail, and inquire into the results actually accomplished by missionaries in a few important countries. Protestants are especially given to exultation over the alleged civilizing tendencies of their missions, and very unthinkingly attribute to them whatever advance in civilization has followed the contact of barbarous races with the various nations of Europe and America. The new and destructive vices that are thus propagated among savage tribes they attribute to other causes; but all the real improvement that is gained in consequence of such contact they ascribe without exception to the influence of Christianity. The influences of agriculture, commerce, education, and all the arts and inventions of civilized life, which have nothing to do with Christianity as a religion, and which are the real causes of the larger part of whatever ameliorations are introduced into barbarous communities by Europeans and Americans, they quite forget and leave out of the account; or, if they remember them at all, they ludicrously ascribe them, and civilization itself, to the sole influence of Christianity. Even the social gain that is derived from the better code of morals that accompanies Christianity owes nothing to the proclamation of distinctively Christian doctrines, but has been accomplished in spite of, rather than in consequence of, these doctrines. But since the missionaries, especially those sent out by Protestants, have partially devoted their labors to the purely secular advancement of the various communities in which they live, it would be unjust to them not to recognize all the good they have really done in this direction. Accordingly I wish to refer, briefly of course, to some of the most striking cases in which missionaries have succeeded or failed in civilizing heathen populations, premising that whatever good has been thus actually accomplished I ascribe to the missionaries as civilized men, not as Christian propagandists.

No Christian mission ever acquired in any barbarous community a degree of control so absolute as that acquired by the Jesuits among the Guaranis, in Paraguay. In various other parts of America, the Jesuits succeeded wonderfully with their missions; but in Paraguay they built up what deserves to be called a Jesuit empire, mainly by the power of persuasion and kindness exercised over the minds of the Indians. In 1602, Acquaviva, the fifth General of the Society of Jesus, sent out a special commissioner to superintend the plan of concentrating the missionary efforts of the Jesuits on this enterprise; and despite all difficulties, their success was marvellous. The Guaranis were the most wide-spread race of South American Indians, mild and passionless in their general character, and therefore exactly such material as the Jesuits wanted. Over these Guaranis in Paraguay the missionaries established a theocracy of their own. Settlements were commenced about the year 1610, and were sustained about one hundred and fifty years. The Indians were gathered into villages, called Reductions, and by degrees were persuaded to abandon their wild life in order to cultivate the ground. The social system adopted was a sort of Christian Communism, all the produce being stored in large buildings under the management of the Jesuits, who issued regular rations to all the inhabitants. I cannot describe in detail these singular settlements or Reductions, of which, according to Dobrizhoffer, there were in 1732 about thirty in all, embracing a population of 141,000 "souls." Similar establishments were founded in other parts of South America, embracing in all nearly as many more. Never was the missionary system so fairly or so successfully tried as in Paraguay; and the experiment illustrates the best that can be done by Catholic propagandism.

Now what was the real success of this system in Paraguay, when tested by its ability to create a vigorous and self-evolving civilization? I shall quote first from Nicolini's History of the Jesuits [pp. 306-307]:—

"It has been said that the inhabitants of the Reduction were low and abject slaves, led on by the scourge, deprived even of the faculty of thinking, and confined in a perpetual imprisonment, though within a large space. Quinet, with perhaps more eloquence than reason, exclaims—'Are we sure that it [Paraguay] contains the germ of a great empire? Where is the sign of life? Everywhere else, indeed, one hears the qualling of the child in the cradle; here, I greatly fear, I confess, that so much silence prevailing in the same place for three ages is but a bad sign, and that the regime which can so quietly enervate virgin Nature cannot be any other than that which develops Gautmozen and Montezuma.' All this is very well said, and may be in part true. Doubtless these people were kept in perpetual infancy. Doubtless, nothing great, nothing of a creating stamp, must be expected from them. Doubtless, they did not develop and expand the new element of life imparted to them, as other nations have done who were more left to themselves; nor did they exercise the noblest part of their natures, the intelligence, in that pursuit for which we think man was created—the search after truth. But surely there are nations who have been placed in worse circumstances, and subjected to more disastrous influences, and more deserving our pity and commiseration. . . . Although we know that humanity must progress in its career, and that this progress cannot be attained without great commotion and great evil, nevertheless, when we contemplate all the miseries which surround our state of civilization, we freely forgive the Jesuits for having, in one part of the globe, let civilization and progress sleep awhile, to render these poor Indians happy."

On the same subject, I will quote a few sentences from the Encyclopædia Britannica:—"The Jesuits were able to introduce settled habits and a slight knowledge of religion and the arts among the Indians only by means of the personal ascendancy they acquired over them. It was a few superior minds gaining the respect and confidence of a horde of savages, then employing the influence they had acquired to lead them as children—giving them such portion of instruction as taught them to trust implicitly in their guides, working alternately on their fears, their pride, their kind affections, but never fully unveiling to them the springs of the machinery by which they were governed. The incurable indolence of the savages rendered it necessary to prescribe the labor as task-work, and to carry it on under the constant inspection of the missionaries. The plan of cultivating the ground in common, and of storing the produce in magazines, out of which the wants of each family were supplied, was resorted to as a check upon their improvident habits. In short, the eye and the hand of the missionaries were everywhere; and the social system was held together entirely by their knowledge and address. When these were withdrawn, the fabric soon fell into ruins, and the Indians relapsed into their idolatry and savage habits, just as boys drop their tasks the moment they are liberated from school."

Let me adduce one more witness on this subject, the Westminster Review for July, 1857:—"The Jesuits in Paraguay are universally considered to have exhibited the best results ever obtained in the missionary field, while the Jesuits in India and China were the grief and disgrace of their church in the opinion of its head. . . . The system endured till the Jesuit organization was broken up in 1767, when presently the whole fabric completely vanished. No trace whatever remains of this great missionary work. If the question of success is stirred, the reply of Catholics is that a hundred thousand souls were rescued from hell, and that the crowns of the apostles and martyrs of the work are brightened accordingly. Historical students and moralists say that, judged by any radical principle, the work has come to nothing. We see that among a people saved by their teachers from the trouble of thinking and from the pressure of worldly anxieties, the lash in the school and bribes or terrors out of it must be needed for stimulus; but we think ill of such a state of society, and are not surprised to hear that its subjects were delicate in frame, scrupulous in conscience, indolent at their work, and dull at their play, though their teachers prescribed amusement as earnestly as our Polynesian missionaries interdict it. That such a demure, superficial, dependent, and artificial state of society should fall to pieces at once when its keepers were withdrawn, is just what might have been looked for; and, as all traces of it have vanished, it can be pronounced, in a historical and moral sense, nothing but a failure."

Such, then, is the kind of civilization built up by the Catholic system of propagandism, when left perfectly free to work itself out to its natural results. Of what value it is, you must judge for yourselves. To my mind, it appears scarcely better than the savagery it professed to cure. It was only the change of one barbarism for another.

Turning now to the Protestant missionary system, I will select the Sandwich Islands as the instance which Protestants themselves cite as the most signal and conspicuous illustration of the civilization created by their missions. In this case, it is more difficult to determine the exact degree of missionary influence in producing the present social condition of the Sandwich Islanders. General causes have been at work here; and the claim, insinuated by silence as to these causes rather than directly asserted, that the whole of the social improvement effected is due to the missions alone, will not bear examination. Nevertheless, I am willing for the present to give the missionaries credit for the entire work of civilization so far as accomplished; and I propose to inquire how much this civilization is actually worth.

The Sandwich Islands had, by the census taken in 1836, rather more than 100,000 inhabitants. The whole of the population is nominally Christian, and the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions about a dozen years ago reported more than 22,000 church members. The missionaries have busied themselves in planting churches, establishing schools, and training native missionaries and teachers. Idolatry has wholly vanished. Nearly all the children, it is said, are taught to read. Besides 300 common schools, we are told of three high schools and one college. Several newspapers are regularly published. "The total number of pages printed by the presses connected with the missionaries exceeds 196,000,000." The moral condition of the people is said by the friends of the missions to be vastly improved since 1820, at which time missionary operations were first commenced; although very different accounts of it have been given by other parties. Which representation of the matter is the more correct, is perhaps open to doubt. That the nominal conversion of the people to Christianity, or the large number of church-members reported (over twenty per cent. of the entire population), is any proof whatever of a higher moral state of society, I cannot admit. So far as general education and individual improvement of character have really resulted from the preaching and teaching of the missionaries, I rejoice as much as any one; but the numerous rose-colored reports of interested parties are not borne out by other witnesses. On this subject, let me quote the testimony of Dr. W. Brown, one of the very highest authorities concerning missions:—

"It may appear surprising that so many of the converts from heathenism should turn out to be only nominal Christians. It might naturally be thought that—in giving up with the religion of their fore-fathers and their country, and embracing a new religion of an entirely opposite character, we might calculate on its being the result of inquiry and consideration, and that, if not particularly intelligent, the generality of them would be true Christians. But to say nothing of the fact that in all countries and in all ages (unless, perhaps, in apostolic times) the great majority of professed Christians have been Christians only in name, there are circumstances which, especially in some countries, will account for the natives coming over to the religion of the missionaries, without there being any substantial or spiritual change in their own state and character. Nowhere in modern times have missions been considered as achieving such great and glorious triumphs as in the South Sea Islands; yet, while we have no doubt that much good was in various ways effected in these islands, it yet appears that the religious revolution which took place in many of them was materially the result of the example and influence of the chiefs,—more, in the first instance, than of the teaching of the missionaries. So long as the chiefs adhered to the religion of their fathers, the people had no thought of changing it; but as soon as they declared in favor of the new religion, their subjects were ready to follow them. They would now destroy the morais, burn or deliver up their idols, profess to be Christians, erect places of worship, observe the Sabbath day with great outward strictness, while yet they continued to indulge in the most degrading vices, living like beasts of the field. As regards the great body of the people, the revelation wanted not only purity, but reality. Christianity now became in a manner the national religion, and the mass of the population outwardly conformed to it. It is also worthy of mention that, among the Sandwich Islanders, at least, it was a great object of ambition to be received as members of the church. 'A tabu meeting (i. e. a meeting consisting of selected persons) was to the mind of a Hawaiian one of the most desirable things on earth. Hence the constant pressure by them at the door of the church. It would have been the easiest thing imaginable to have added as many to it in one day as the Apostles did on the day of Pentecost.' We have already seen that the numbers of communicants of the Negro race are very great as compared with other classes of heathens; and though we do not recollect ever to have seen it stated as a fact, yet we greatly suspect that pride is often at the bottom of their desire to be baptized,—that their being so raises them in their own estimation above their unbaptized countrymen, and brings them a step nearer to white men, to whom, though often their oppressors, they cannot help looking up as their superiors. These circumstances, and in some cases self-interest in one form or another, will explain how professed converts from among the heathen are so often only nominal Christians."

Testimony very similar to the above is given by Dr. Livingstone, the famous African traveller, with reference to these Negro converts:—

"The Bechuana mission has been so far successful that, when coming from the interior, we always felt, on reaching Kuruman, we had returned to civilized life. But I would not give any one to understand that they are model Christians,—we cannot claim to be model Christians ourselves,—or even in any degree superior to the members of our own country churches. They are more stingy and greedy than the poor at home; but in many respects the two are exactly alike. On asking an intelligent chief what he thought of them, he replied—"You white men have no idea of how wicked we are; we know each other better than you. Some feign belief to ingratiate themselves with the missionaries; some profess Christianity because they like the system which gives so much more importance to the poor; and the rest—a pretty large number—profess because they are really true believers."

But the evidence as to the low moral state of the Sandwich Islanders is not merely general, inferential, or vague. I will quote again from the Westminster Review, trusting that the length of the extract will be more than offset by its great interest:—

"In the Sandwich Islands, the decline of the population is such as history can hardly parallel and as every hearer at an Exeter May Meeting should be informed of. We are told, not only by native tradition, but by the early navigators of the Pacific, that there were once human abodes wherever there was good soil and water, and that the population of this group was not less than 400,000. Now it is under 65,000. Twenty-five years ago [1832]—within the period of strenuous missionary efforts,—it was double this. . . . It is of importance to ascertain what relation the presence of missionaries bears to the broad and clear fact of the unchecked depopulation of the islands in which they have settled. According to the missionaries themselves, an unbounded licentiousness prevailed before any European had set foot anywhere in the Pacific; and it continued after foreigners had begun to resort to the islands, and before the missionaries arrived. During the first period there were the wars and the barbarous heathen customs which tend to depopulation, and a truly heathen licentiousness. During the second period, there was the addition of physical and moral mischiefs—diseases and intemperance,—which, acting upon the established licentiousness, might account for even such a depopulation as is recorded. But now, when the missionaries declare the people to be pure in comparison with their former condition, and cured of their tendency to war, infanticide, and recklessness of life, the depopulation is found to have proceeded faster than ever,—even to the extent of half the total number in five-and-twenty years. The natives themselves charge the missionaries with no small portion of it; and a good many visitors are of the same opinion.

"The people say that the missionaries promised them life, but have brought them only death; and that it is not a future life that they want, but to live long where they are, and as happily as they used to do before all their customs were changed and their pleasures taken away. There can be no question of the injurious effects upon health and life of the forcible change of habits imposed by the missionaries, nor of the fatal results of some of their over-legislation. Even the least important change of all—that of dress—has rendered the people liable in a much increased degree to consumption and related maladies. Far worse is the effect of the suppression of the old sports and festivals. The people cannot receive hymn-singing and prayer-meetings as a substitute; and they relapse into an indolence and sensuality which leaves nothing to be wondered at in the shortening of their lives. Of the deepening of the poverty of the poor with the growth of the aristocratic spirit under the missionaries, and of the deterioration of the health of whole settlements by a chronic hunger which their forefathers never knew, recent accounts from the most various quarters leave no room for doubt.

"And when the dulness of their lives has aggravated their licentiousness, how do the missionaries deal with it? How do they treat the milder forms of license which they have not succeeded in extirpating? They put upon tropical lovers the screw of puritanical laws too strict for Old England and New England two centuries ago. It is very well understood that infanticide is most frequent in societies where public shame awaits the unmarried mother, and that sensual vices are most gross where they are most harshly dealt with; and, as might be expected, the Pacific Islands are no exception to this rule. The girls of those islands are as proud of having white husbands (knowing them to be local husbands only) as the women of Cape Coast now, and the Indian women of the western hemisphere in the early days of its discovery; but the South Sea Islanders, having learned the consequence of the appearance of half-caste children, resort to practices which render the decline of population no wonderful matter at all. Like the grim old Puritan Elders, the missionaries inflict imprisonment and public shame where young mothers are not married in their Church. If in New England such culprits suffered in heart-broken silence, or were hardened or rendered hypocrites, the effect on a people whose ancestors practised infanticide as a duty is easily conceived.

"The children of the tropics suffer under the missionary method more bitterly than their childish hearts can bear. On the one hand, they are accessible to new temptations, and perpetrate frolics which their spiritual masters are the last to know of; and, on the other, they escape punishment by those very forms of crime which Exeter Hall orators hold up to public horror as the most monstrous features of heathenism. Under every imaginable incentive to abortion and infanticide, and to licentiousness aggravated by the necessity of secrecy, it is no wonder if depopulation increases, and if the natives consider the missionaries accountable for it.

"After bearing at some length his testimony to the failure of 'mickonaree' industry and notions of dress, Commander Wilkes adds—"Many of the missionaries now see these things in their true light, and informed me that they were endeavoring to pursue a more enlightened course.' Have they informed their supporters and subscribers to the same effect? Was anything said at the last or any preceding May Meeting,—and will anything be said at the next, about these mistakes and failures? It was a pretty strong confidence which led men forth to impress on a vast majority of mankind the dogmas and tastes of a very small majority; not to communicate provable knowledge, it must be observed, but to impose dogmas at the cost of eradicating beliefs, warring against all natural influences, local and moral, and thereby breaking the spring of the native character, and preparing a whole race for premature extinction. One would think that, when the agents of such an operation found themselves more or less mistaken in their aims and methods, they would learn modesty in their office, and possibly sympathy with their perishing charge. But where are there evidences of this?"

"Alas! thus it is. Coal-scuttle bonnets for the garland and palm-leaf! The Old Hundred for the national ballad! Levitical law for heroic tradition! A tabu-Sunday every week, and no harvest-home once a year! Idleness, breeding slander and dissoluteness, for the easy but willing occupation of former days! All distinctive character covered over with hypocrisy, and native prattle absorbed by cant! The palm-tree growing, the coral spreading, and man dwindling and perishing! If such are the best and choicest fruits of English Protestant missions, with what grace can Protestants scoff at Romish failure?"

I must add also an extract, quoted in the same article, from a record of direct observations by an American voyager, namely, Residence in the Marquesas, by Herman Melville, son-in-law of the late Chief Justice Shaw, of Massachusetts:—

"Readers of Reports are led to infer that the arts and customs of civilized life are rapidly refining the natives of the Sandwich Islands. But let no one be deceived by these accounts. The chiefs swagger about in gold-lace and broad-cloth, while the great mass of the common people are nearly as primitive in their appearance as in the days of Cook. In the progress of events at the islands, the two classes are receding from each other; the chiefs are daily becoming more luxurious and extravagant in their style of living, and the common people more and more destitute of the necessities and decencies of life. But the end to which both will arrive at last will be the same. The one are fast destroying themselves by sensual indulgences, and the other are fast being destroyed by a complication of disorders and the want of wholesome food. The resources of the domineering chiefs are wrung from the starving serfs, and every additional bauble with which they bedeck themselves is purchased by the suffering of their bondmen; so that the measure of the gew-gaw refinement attained by the chiefs is only an index to the actual state of degradation in which the greater part of the population lie grovelling.

"Not until I visited Honolulu was I aware of the fact that the small remnant of the natives had been civilized into draught horses, and evangelized into beasts of burden. But so it is. They have been literally broken into the traces, and are harnessed to the vehicles of their spiritual instructors like so many dumb brutes!

"Among a multitude of similar exhibitions that I saw, I shall never forget a robust, red-faced and very lady-like personage, a missionary's spouse, who day after day for months together took her regular airings in a little go-cart drawn by two of the islanders, one an old gray-headed man, and the other a roguish stripling, both being, with the exception of the fig-leaf, as naked as when they were born. Over a level piece of ground this pair of draught bipeds would go with a shambling, unsightly trot, the youngster hanging back all the time like a knowing horse, while the hack plodded on and did all the work.

"Rattling along through the streets of the town in this stylish equipage, the lady looks about her as magnificently as any queen driven in state to her coronation. A sudden elevation and a sandy road, however, soon disturb her serenity. The small wheels soon become imbedded in the loose soil, and the old stagger-stands tugging and sweating, while the young one frisks about and does nothing. Not an inch does the chariot budge. Will the tender-hearted lady—who has left friends and home for the good of the souls of the poor heathen—will she think a little about their bodies, and get out, and ease the wretched old man until the ascent is mounted? Not she; she could not dream of it. To be sure, she used to think nothing of driving the cows to pasture on the old farm in New England; but times have changed since then. So she retains her seat, and bawls out, 'Hooke! hooke!' (pull, pull.) The old gentleman, frightened at the sound, labors away harder than ever; and the younger one makes a great show of straining himself, but takes care to keep one eye upon his mistress, in order to know when to dodge out of harm's way. At last the good lady loses all patience. 'Hooke! hooke!' and rap goes the heavy handle of her huge fan over the naked skull of the old savage, while the young one shies to one side, and keeps beyond its range. 'Hooke! hooke!' again she cries. 'Hooke! tata kannaka!' (pull strong, men.) But all in vain, and she is obliged in the end to dismount, and, sad necessity! actually to walk to the top of the hill.

"At the town where this paragon of humility resides, is a spacious and elegant American chapel, where divine service is regularly performed. Twice every Sabbath, towards the close of the exercises, may be seen a score or two of little waggons, ranged along the railing in front of the edifice, with two squalid native footmen in the livery of nakedness standing by each, and waiting for the dismissal of the congregation to draw their superiors home."

On the whole, therefore, I conclude that the nominal conversion of the Sandwich Islanders to Christianity is not what it is believed to be, a prima facie proof of an improved moral character; and that the accounts given by returned travellers of their low moral condition are not to be branded as self-evident lies. It is more than likely, in my opinion, that contact with Christians and Christian missionaries has harmed, rather than benefited, the inhabitants of the South Sea Islands. They are rapidly decreasing in numbers, and are probably destined to fade entirely away before a more vigorous race. But just so far as the missionaries have forgotten their Christian doctrines and labored earnestly for the moral and social welfare of these poor people, I would applaud them as real benefactors of their race. This, however, they must do in spite of their system, which places all this as infinitely lower in importance than faith in the Christian gospel of salvation by Christ alone. The highest success that can be claimed for Christian missions in the Sandwich Islands is that they have replaced the old superstition by a new one, and helped to smoothe the Islanders' way to the sure extinction brought upon them by Christian nations.

In dealing with purely barbarous communities, therefore, I think it just to say that both the Catholic and Protestant missions have accomplished considerable incidental good, by preaching a higher morality and by helping in a greater or less degree to civilize them. But this work of civilization has been hampered and hindered at every step by the supposed duty of first inculcating a new superstition in place of the old. Naturally enough the Protestant missionaries have done more of this civilizing work than the Catholics, for they have shaken off to some extent the shackles of the old intolerable bondage; but they would have done vastly more still, if they had gone out with the pure love of man in their hearts, unmixed with the baleful belief that man needs to be redeemed from future rather than present ills. The missionary spirit—that is, the willingness and the will to devote a whole life to the work of making others better and happier—is surely the sublimest and divinest manifestation of humanity's noblest part. Could it but be dissociated from narrow and narrowing creeds, and set free to work itself out into action through healthy, natural channels,—could there but be a grand crusade of freedom against slavery, of knowledge against ignorance, of human love and virtue against human hate and vice,—could there but be an organized effort on the part of all nations to carry education, intelligence, and truer and happier modes of living to all the dark corners of the earth,—then surely there would be the dawn of a better day even here at home, and the new-born "enthusiasm of humanity," flaming out in works of mercy and love to the sufferers of far-distant lands, would also light up the hearts and households of our own land with a purer, holier glow. Not till the burdens of all men are our burdens too,—not till we "remember those in bonds as bound with them,"—can we ourselves be truly noble and great; and, despite all its errors and defects and follies, the missionary system of Christian propagandism is a veritable hint and fore-shadowing of a still greater missionary system that is to come.

While a very little child, I heard one day a good old missionary, Dr. Scudder, who had returned from Ceylon after years of faithful toil for a brief visit to his native land, preach about the perishing heathen in the far-off tropics; and a great desire was born in my childish heart to spend my days in the same high toil. Half a dozen years afterwards, when Dr. Scudder had returned for his last visit to his home, and was about to sail again to the familiar scene of his labors, I could not repress the wish I felt to see him once more. Hastening one sunny morning to the rooms of the American Board of Foreign Missions in Boston, I found him just on the point of starting for the wharf whence the ship was to sail for India. I timidly put my quarter-dollar in his hand, and told him I had come to say good-by. The kindly-faced old man bent down and kissed me—I thought with a tear in his eye; and I hurried home.

But I have often thought that, in a far different manner than he would approve or I imagined, my old wish has come true; and that I am nothing, after all, but a missionary of the better faith that will yet convert Christendom itself, even as he was laboring to convert heathendom to Christianity. Surely, the heathen of Ceylon can scarcely hear with greater coldness or abhorrence the message he proclaimed than the Christians of America hear mine to-day. But what of that? If the servants of the new gospel of freedom and knowledge, truth and virtue and natural humanity, show less zeal and less self-sacrifice than the servants of the outworn gospel of Christ, or if they shrink from difficulties that these have learned to conquer, is it not right that they should be judged men of smaller stature and narrower souls? The world to-day needs the new gospel, not the old; and if it be indeed the gospel of truth and hope to all mankind, then most assuredly its missionaries will be born. And while I have told you truly what I believe to be the weakness and the mistake of Christian propagandism, I should be less than true to my duty if I spoke no word of faith in the propagandism of Free Religion. If the world to-day needs the principles of free science and free thought, free virtue and free humanity, free reverence for man and free self-consecration to the infinitely Perfect, then it needs missionaries as never before; and I count it an honor to be one of them.

The noblest feature of the missionary system is the education it bestows on the disinterested side of human nature—the self-sacrificing generosity which prompts each to give according to his ability, the wealthy man his gold, the intellectua. man his brain, and every man his deep, strong, active sympathy. However widely our views diverge from those which prompted a Paul, a Xavier, or a Judson to spend life and heart in the missionary work, we too need the divine chrism of the missionary spirit; for in each and every form i is the Love of Man. Be it ours, not to love less, but to love more,—with the light of a larger wisdom and the heat of a purer zeal!

[NOTE.—Since my former lecture was published, I have found pertinent statistics credited to the last Annual Report of the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, presented at Chicago, May, 1871. From this Report it appears that the annual receipts were over $250,000; that the number of missionaries employed was over 1200; and that the number of conversions effected was over 5,000. It follows from these data that each missionary on the average made 4.16 converts in the year, and that a home missionary is only a very little more successful than a foreign missionary. It also follows, however, that the average cost of each home convert is but $50; and that a heathen convert, costing $270, is five and two-fifths times as expensive as a home convert. Instead, therefore, of saying that it takes three dollars to send one to the heathen, it would be correct to say that it takes four and two-fifths dollars to send one to them. It is thus evident that, as I supposed, I understated the truth. As to the lower average of conversions accomplished by home missionaries than I had supposed, it is plain that many were reckoned among the latter who gave only a part of their time to the work of missions, inasmuch as the more than 1200 missionaries are reported as having performed an aggregate of only 965 years of service. Probably fifteen converts a year would not be regarded as a large number of conversions, if effected by a missionary who gave his whole time to the work. My original statement, understood as I used it, was too favorable to the foreign mission system, and understates its costliness as compared with the system of home missions.]

A GOOD-NIGHT RHYME.

Hush-a-by, my bonny boy,
Mama's pet and papa's joy!
Rest, little feet, little hands, little head,
Peacefully in your cradle-bed.

Mr. Tilton's argument in favor of woman suffrage, drawn from existing constitutional law, and embodied in his admirably logical and powerful appeal to Senator Sumner, seems to us irresistible. All reasonable objections that we can imagine seem to have been fully and fairly answered. We hope that Mr. Sumner, the noblest and greatest statesman of whom America can boast to-day, will put the keystone to the arch of his great fame by introducing a declaratory resolution into the United States Senate which shall settle forever this question of woman suffrage in favor of equal human rights. We are not so sanguine as to expect that the Senate would adopt it; but it will be a great gain to the cause of universal suffrage that it should be introduced. Nothing could have a greater effect in moulding public opinion in the right direction than such a declaratory resolution introduced by Charles Sumner; and on public opinion, at last, must all hope of success to woman's cause rest. "Let justice be done, though the heavens fall!"

The Radical for October opens with an admirable article by Mr. C. D. B. Mills, on "Zoroaster and his Religion," to be concluded next month. Mr. M. D. Conway has also an article of exceeding interest, "Huxley on Berkeley," which we especially commend to those who defend in the nineteenth century the raw materialism of the eighteenth. Among other articles are—"The Christian Controversy," by N. R. Waters; "Educational Reform," by George Walker; "Progress has no Goal," by C. O. Whitman; "Thoughts on Immortality," by Isaac Dolman. Send thirty cents to S. H. Morse, 25 Bromfield St., Boston, for this excellent number of a most excellent periodical.

Dr. Blair, in his "Lectures on Rhetoric and Belles Lettres," has a sentence worthy of especial attention from those who urge too exclusively the "claims of the heart in religion":—"The understanding must always be applied to in the first place, in order to make a lasting impression on the heart; and he who would work on men's passions, or influence their practice, without first giving them just principles and enlightening their minds, is no better than a mere declaimer. He may raise transient emotions or kindle a passing ardor, but can produce no solid or lasting effect."

The "King of Terrors" has for us no terror so terrific as the certainty of our being posthumously interviewed by some "medium." But the silver lining to that cloud is the chance thus given to contradict the pious fiction that we were converted on our death-bed. We authorize our ghost beforehand, if he cannot control his own garrulity, to make that report of the case. But if he dares to add one syllable more, we hereby denounce him as a fraud.

Dr. Bellows suggests that letters should be so directed that the name of the State, written in full, should come first, to be followed by that of the county and town, the name of the person addressed being put inconspicuously in the lower left-hand corner of the envelope. The suggestion is excellent, and would doubtless save countless mistakes in the Post-office, not to mention the annoyance and frequent inconvenience attributable to our present manner of directing letters.

TREATMENT OF CRIME.

I wonder how many persons in the United States have read the "Transactions of the National Congress on Penitentiary and Reformatory Discipline," held at Cincinnati, in October of last year. The volume is a very formidable one, containing six hundred and forty-two solid pages,—not a pamphlet to be taken up preparatory to an after-dinner nap. Yet it only covers the proceedings of a Convention of six days, and though it treats of a great variety of questions included under the general subject, no one of the questions is exhausted. It is a book to be studied and pondered, especially by the legislators, reformers, philanthropists, preachers—by all persons who have anything to do with the practical problems of crime. And when it comes to that, who does not somewhere come into practical contact with this subject? What citizen in New York at this time is not touched and in some way made to suffer for the unpunished crimes of the guilty men who for years have had the control of civil affairs in that city? And in a Republic, where the laws are made "by the people and for the people," who is there of us who can escape all responsibility for the administration of this most important and most difficult department of government,—the treatment of crime?

One thing is very evident: the subject at present is in a very unsatisfactory condition both theoretically and practically. And this volume of "Transactions," if it shows nothing else, shows this,—that there is most urgent need of reform in the methods of treating crime, and that to secure reform there is urgent need of the most careful investigation and discussion. One difficulty clearly is that the penalties for crime ordained by the laws are too generally based on a theory of crime that is fast becoming obsolete. The penalties belong to an age when it was believed that crime was to be avenged rather than remedied. The sentiment of benevolence, or the desire to reform the criminal, is now taking the place of the old feeling which demanded that he should be punished. The new doctrine is, penalties are for reformation, not for revenge. But the character of the penalties has not as yet been very much changed to accord with this new theory of their purpose. And the consequence is that many criminals get clear, escaping all penalty, and that generally in our penal institutions there is a mongrel treatment of the inmates,—an attempt to infuse the new sentiment of benevolence into the old system of penalty,—which, as might be expected, fails to have the effect of either one method or the other.

The reformatory purpose, must establish methods of its own. It may be true that human nature even under the worst forms is too good to be hanged. I at least think that a civilized community which, to be safe, must kill its criminals, condemns itself. But a community which lets its criminals go free, with the idea that perhaps they are not quite responsible for their crimes, or that they may somehow or other get reformed, also condemns itself, and will most surely suffer the penalty remitted to them. Equally true is it that hundreds of criminals are let loose upon the community every year, after two or five or ten years of solitary confinement at hard labor and coarse fare, who are just as dangerous members of society as they were at the beginning of their imprisonment. Solitary confinement at hard unvarying labor does not tend to reform men more than does hanging. The problem is so to combine restraint, confinement, discipline, with kind treatment, elevating employment, opportunities for education and judicious social intercourse, that reformation shall at least be possible, if not probable: and then to make actual reformation a condition of release.

A GOSPEL OF HONESTY.

In a contribution in No. 80 of THE INDEX on "Pious Frauds," we spoke of the lack, in the Christian Scriptures, of a gospel of honesty, truthfulness, and anti-jesuitism. The Christian Register took us to task for this criticism, and, to disprove our statements, quoted some words from the vigorous pen of Theodore Parker, commending the action of Jesus in driving the "thieves" out of the Temple at Jerusalem.

Dear Register, is this the only example of a "gospel of honesty" you can adduce from New Testament Scriptures? If so, Hall and Connolly need feel no uneasiness,—for though they are "thieves," they are not thieves in a temple of worship, like their ancient prototypes. The men in the Temple "who sold oxen and sheep and doves" may have been "thieves," as Jesus called them; but what evidence have we that they were not honest Jews, selling good meat at fair prices to those who wished to offer sacrifice? We remember that Origen characterized the conduct of Jesus on this occasion according to the literal interpretation, as "assuming and seditious."

But admitting that these "money-changers" were thieves, what is the lesson? Not that it is wrong always and everywhere for men to cheat and steal and thief in selling—but that it is wrong to do these things in the "house of prayer." It was their profanity, and not their knavery, that exasperated Jesus. Whoever will read Mark xi. must come to this conclusion. There is no evidence, if this "den of thieves" had been outside the "house of prayer," that Jesus would have denounced them. The story is a lesson on reverence for sacred things rather than on honesty in trade. We have no doubt that Jesus loved honesty; our criticism is that he rarely taught it. His best lesson on it is in Luke xvi.—the parable of the "Unjust Steward." But here a faithless steward who basely betrayed his master, is denominated simply the "unjust" steward—a rather mild epithet to apply to such a lying thief as he was.

The truth is, that there are very few lessons on the duty of honesty in Jesus' sermons or in Paul's letters. The New Testament is replete with beautiful lessons in benevolence, charity, and love. But on the virtue of honesty, the very noblest and crowning virtue, as well as on patriotism and temperance, it gives us few lessons. We can easily understand the reason. Jesus preached against the most common sins in his day. He saw men hating one another, like the Jews and Samaritans, and he said—"Love one another!" He saw men selfish, as they always are, and he said,—"Give, give, and sacrifice self." He saw men professing to believe what they did not believe, and he said,—"Woe unto you, hypocrites!" But he probably saw little intemperance, and hence he never thought to lecture on temperance. Jerusalem was under the iron arm of Rome. The Jews were a subject people; their patriotism had died out; and therefore Jesus never preached on political liberty and independence, but commended obedience to the powers that be, saying—"Render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's." In that day, too, there was little commerce, compared with these times, and not so much thieving, fraud and corruption; and it may well have been that dishonesty rarely came before the eyes of Jesus to suggest a sermon on honesty. If there had been a "Tammany Ring" in Jerusalem, or a New York Custom House at Cæsarea, or an Erie R. R. somewhere in Palestine, so that Jesus might have seen what we see to our shame, then he might have left us burning words of rebuke and condemnation of the Fisks, Tweeds, Connollys, Gearys, and their ilk of "honorable" thieves and public robbers. But, alas for these days! we can find nowhere in the recorded sermons of Jesus the "gospel of honesty" which these times of political and commercial fraud and corruption demand.

We do not find fault with Jesus that he did not do more. No man can see and say everything needful. Considering his short ministry and the age and country in which he lived, it is remarkable that he should have left us so much ethical doctrine that is fully up with the wants of the nineteenth century. For the much he did, we are profoundly grateful. But at the same time we must see and admit that his gospel of benevolence and love, and Paul's "faith, hope, and charity," are inadequate to the growing needs of this stirring age. We repeat that there is, in the Christian Scriptures, a lack of the gospel of honesty. Christianity proper has no armory of weapons against the very greatest sins and sinners of our country. What do our Wall Street gamblers, our bank-defaulters, our legal swindlers who fail rich, our political thieves, our railroad robbers, our venal judges and legislators,—what do they care for the Sermon on the Mount or Paul's discourse on Faith, Hope, and Charity? Absolutely nothing. The Christian has no arrow in his quiver that can hit them. He may fire dogmatics at them nine-tenths of the time, as he generally does, and they will go to sleep, as they generally do. And one-tenth of the time, when he does preach a sermon on practical morality, it is to ring the changes on "love and give," "love and give,"—that, and nothing more.

Now we want something more and a good deal more,—a gospel of the stern, masculine virtues of honesty and justice. While preachers descant on the beauty and duty of love, forgiveness, and holiness, rogues enjoy it and thieves ply their trade. They love and are willing to be loved. They haven't the least objection to being forgiven by those they have robbed, and are even ready to forgive them. They will carry the beatitudes home with them and lock them up in their safe with their stolen bonds, and then retire to sweet slumbers.

But let the preacher take a new text—one he will not find in the Bible—like this: "Let justice be done, and robbers be caught and hung!" Let the church echo it in vigorous earnestness, and they will listen. There is a clear ring to these words that means something. "Justice!" That name to them sounds like a policeman's rattle, like the clanking of hand-cuffs, like the dreaded judgment of the court, and the bolt sliding in the iron door. This is what the times cry for—a gospel of honesty and justice. It is this sentiment that Christianity needs to supplement its love and charity. Its ethics are imperfect. Its sweet love ought to wed noble honesty, which it may even get from pagan Stoicism. If Free Religion writes a Bible, let there be in it several Sermons on the Mount, saying—"Blessed are the honest, for their reward is a clear conscience. Cursed are the dishonest, for they must receive their punishment now."

If the Christian Register supposes we are alone in thinking the ethics of Christianity imperfect, we will convince it that we are not, by quoting the following from Stuart Mill's work on Liberty:—"I believe that other ethics than any which can be evolved from exclusively Christian sources, must exist side by side with Christian ethics to produce the moral regeneration of mankind. . . . The exclusive pretension made by a part of the truth to be the whole must and ought to be protested against." So says Free Religion, too.

TINCTURED ORTHODOXY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

The letter of a lady which was published in No. 89, alluding to a conversation with a 'liberal' Methodist clergyman while travelling in the cars, brings to mind a similar case in which I was interested, one year ago last summer. Only my clergyman was a Presbyterian, and the interview occurred on a steamboat instead of the cars.

The gentleman was pastor of a church in a pleasant town in Ohio, was a scholar and a man of culture throughout; almost an enthusiast in his love of scientific studies, and exceptionally liberal in his theology. On Sunday, as the steamer ploughed her lonely way across Lake Michigan, it was proposed that religious services should be held in the cabin. A venerable Episcopal clergyman present read some appropriate selections from the Prayer-book, and was followed by his Presbyterian brother in a most acceptable half-hour sermon, or lecture.

His subject was the life of Jesus—Jesus the Teacher, the Enlightener, the Exemplar; not a hint of him as Redeemer in any sacrificial sense. He spoke of the unworldly, simple-mannered Judæan youth, who by his zeal, his burning love for humanity, his enthusiasm for the right, his compassion for the erring and suffering, his utter scorn of hypocrisy, so gathered about him the beauty and glory of genuine manhood, that his dazed followers knew not if it were of human or divine origin. He spoke of his intense will, his strange personal magnetism, his powers of healing. He referred to his violent death at the hands of his enemies as a fit seal to his life of separation and self-sacrifice. Of the religious system he bequeathed to his apostles he said not much, but attributed its hold upon men's hearts to the god-like purity and unselfishness of its precepts. There were in the sermon a few indistinct and poetical allusions to the divinity of Jesus, but no word of an atonement for sin wrought by his death.

As the preacher went on, he was warmed by his theme to great earnestness of manner, and the intent faces of his very mixed audience showed that he had made a decided impression. I do not believe there was one heart present, which did not feel—at least for the hour—the kindling fervor of desire caused by the contemplation of a grand life.

Meeting the clergyman afterward upon the deck (we had previously had a few words of conversation), he inquired what I had thought of his discourse. I answered with frankness that I thought he had been reading the Radical. He seemed a little surprised, but assured me that "he did read the Radical sometimes, and found some admirable things in it."

To my remark that his sermon might have been preached by a Unitarian, he replied that he did not feel obligated to present all the aspects of a subject at one time; that to-day he had chosen the human side of Christ's life; at another time he might have treated of his divine nature and his mediatorial office.

He confessed that he preferred practical to doctrinal preaching; that he often found difficulty in representing gospel truths to his hearers exactly as they appeared to himself; that he thought it right to embody truth in such form as seemed best adapted to general comprehension, and calculated to do most good, "yet always looking towards progress."

He had been "much exercised" by the doctrine of Everlasting Punishment and had no faith in a hell of physical torment. The suffering of the impenitent would consist in the knowledge that they must continue sinning, without God and without hope, forever.

I reminded him of the strong language of the New Testament, and asked him why, if a "furnace of fire" does not really mean a furnace of fire, and a "lake of brimstone" does not really mean a lake of brimstone, we are bound to feel certain that "everlasting" really means everlasting. He answered, in substance, that some expressions are unmistakably figurative, and others are undeniably not. Still every man must use his own judgment with prayer and prudence.

Afterward he told me that some divines held the opinion that "everlasting" means a certain number of Greek "æons." I forgot how many; but I have never since heard a clergyman acquainted with Greek preach upon everlasting punishment, without wondering if he wasn't mentally holding those "æons" in reserve as a possible substitute.

On the doctrine of Vicarious Atonement he had "advanced" even farther than Dr. Bushnell, though he remarked that the book had been the means of bringing him out of a very dark place. I did not ask him what kind of a dark place, for I knew experimentally all about it. If this man ever quite frees himself of the iron chain of an orthodox creed, I do not think he will stop at the half-way house of Unitarianism, but that he will set his face squarely toward the temple of Free Religion.

THE PROBABLE TRUTHS OF SPIRITUALISM.

Spiritualism is certainly in more than one respect a curious phenomenon. Concerning its theory, I hold Spiritualism to be a delusion, a fancy; a beautiful, poetical fancy, it is true, but still a fancy, for it has, as I believe, neither truth nor facts for its foundation. Of its "truths" we can, at any rate, not know much, since they are not earthly ones, but commence only beyond the grave in another world which, if not a fancy itself, needs at least to be proved a reality before we can positively speculate upon it. But even if its existence be, for argument's sake, admitted, we can still not know anything about it; hence what Spiritualism teaches as "truths" respecting it can by no means be allowed to be truth,—must necessarily be classed as a fanciful, imaginary, poetical dream.

Nor is it any better with the "facts." True, there is no end to the wonderful "manifestations" claimed by Spiritualism to have taken place, and to the miraculous feats that so-called "mediums" pretend to perform by the aid of Spirits. But here again we have, not the pretended, but the real fact, that these performances of mediums are all done in the "dark circles," or at least in dark rooms or halls, from which all light is banished,—the real fact that, wherever any light is, to the great chagrin of the performing medium, suddenly and unexpectedly let in, or produced by some sceptic, the medium is generally detected in the act of performing all these manifestations himself, claimed by him to be performed by the spirits—the real fact, finally, that now and then a smart man who claims no mediumship, but merely smartness, equals or even outdoes the medium by performing all the "manifestations" of the medium.

Such was the case in this city some five or six years ago with the renowned medium, Fay, and the then Methodist minister, Mr. Dubbs. The occurrence created quite an excitement here at the time, and was by me communicated to the Boston Investigator, which published it. And not long since I read in some paper of a man in Iowa who performed in open daylight, not only all the "manifestations" that a certain medium was performing there in the dark with the pretended aid of the spirits, but even more than that medium or his spirits could perform.

All this goes far to show that the pretended "facts" of Spiritualism are no more facts than its pretended "truths" are truths. But how could this be otherwise?

Is not Spiritualism wanting all and every proof for its "facts" or "truths"? It must first of all prove the existence of spirits before it can assert the truths of Spiritualism. But so long as it cannot prove this first requirement of Spiritualism, and so long as it cannot disprove the argument of Materialists, and more especially their claim that man himself and all else beside him is but matter, that there is no "spirit" either in him or anywhere else; just so long Spiritualism itself can be nothing but a fancy.

And yet Spiritualism cannot be said to be a bad "fancy." No, it is rather one that I like, on account of its doing a great deal of good. For whatever Spiritualism may be, Spiritualists generally are a good sort of people, since they are free-thinking, liberal, and, save their peculiar hobby, pretty free from superstition, and enemies of prejudices. They are, with the exception of some crafty mediums, honest in their belief, enthusiastic and fearless opponents of error, and thus valuable assistants and co-workers in the cause of mental liberty. They ought then, to be acknowledged and treated as such by every Liberal, and not considered as opponents and treated as enemies.

But for all that Spiritualism is a curious phenomenon, and Spiritualists a queer set of people—both, however, well worthy the earnest attention of the thinker. They are, on the one hand, sharp thinkers, strong reasoners, quick to discover the fallacies, errors and mischievous tendencies of the old theology; and yet, on the other hand, they are as credulous and blind in matters of Spiritualism as any bigoted believer in the old theology. The very numerous and active Spiritualists of this city, for instance, have at present employed a number of the best Spiritual lecturers to expound their peculiar ism or faith, the "truths" of Spiritualism; and very able advocates of their cause and fine speakers some of them certainly are, as well as very logical and reasonable when they speak of science and the old theology. But as soon as they commence to speak of Spiritualism, they are about as fanciful and gullible, though never as intolerant, as the most rhapsodical Revival preacher.

So it is with the so-called trance-speakers. We have one of considerable local renown in this city, whom I went last Sunday evening to hear. Her subject was "Revealed and Natural Religion." She spoke for over an hour on her subject with great ability, force and commendable freedom. It was really a fine lecture. But as soon as she left her subject, science and the Bible, and wandered into the vagaries of Spiritualism, she became so illogical, unscientific and imaginary that it formed a most striking contrast with the sound logic, science and real facts of the former part of her discourse.

But one thing especially struck me, as it does every time I go to hear her or any other trance-speaking medium,—namely, the singular fact that the trance state of the speaker lasts just as long as her discourse, and when this is finished the trance also ceases. Is that peculiar twitching that ends it a voluntary act of the speaker?

Yet, for all that, her speaking was very able and creditable, and must certainly have done a lasting good to some of her listeners at the well-filled Universalist Church; although I should have liked it better, and think it would have been much better, if she had spoken as herself and with avowed consciousness.

MORRIS EINHSTEIN.

TITUSVILLE, PA., Sept. 20, 1871.

THE ALLEGED CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE.

BY REV. R. H. HOWARD.

That the writers of the Bible do sometimes in appearance conflict in their statements, both with themselves and with each other, is not to be denied; and when every other species of attack has failed, the enemies of the Bible as an infallible or divinely inspired book have made this their last resort. They assure us that the Bible, by its contradictions, disproves itself; and their daring and diligence in this direction is certainly worthy of a better cause. Meantime it is conceived that their success in this mode of warfare has never been such as to repay them for their pains. They have found it vastly easier to bring charges than to prove them; while their greatest charges are those which have been refuted over and over again.

In offering a few comments upon some of the alleged contradictions of the Bible, it will be convenient for us to discuss them under four different heads,—or to consider them as arranged into four classes.

I. Those said to occur in statements of facts and doctrines.

1. In Deut. v. 12, 13, 14, it is intimated that the Sabbath commemorates the deliverance of Israel from Egyptian bondage, while in Exodus xx. it is stated that it memorializes God's completed Creation. But where, pray, is the "glaring contradiction" here? Is it stated in the latter passage that the Sabbath did not also commemorate the deliverance of the Jews from thralldom, and vice versa? Before we so loudly charge the Bible with contradictions, we should do well first to define what a "glaring contradiction" is. But it is declared in Deut. that "he added nothing more." Who claims that he did? Which record was last compiled?

2. Another instance of alleged contradiction is when one and the same act is in one place (2 Sam. xxiv. 1) ascribed to God, and in another (1 Chron. xxi. 1) to Satan,—namely, the numbering of Israel by David. In reply to this, I remark that this is only one of a great many instances in which various causes may be considered as conspiring, either directly or indirectly, to produce the same events. Thus Solomon is said to have built the Temple, and yet he only hired Hiram to build it. The priests are said to have bought the potter's field. And Judas is said also to have bought the field. One writer in speaking of a certain event has his thoughts directed to one cause; another, occupying a different stand-point, and aiming at a different result, and not attempting anything like scientific fullness and accuracy, directs his attention to another. This by no means involves any contradiction, unless it can be shown that, in the writer's mind, every other cause than the one specified was expressly and absolutely excluded. The difficulty in this particular case is somewhat complicated by the habit, in that utterly unscientific age, of attributing directly to divine or supernatural agency what we should now attribute to natural or second causes. Thus it were inconsistent both with the dictates of experience and common sense, not less than with the analogy of faith, to assume that God directly hardened Pharaoh's heart. He hardened it only as he hardens any sinner's heart that resists good motives and steels himself against the influence of truth. He hardened it only as he damns the drunkard to be filled by his own devices, and to eat of the fruit of his own way.

3. Again; it is alleged that Gen. xxi. 1, "God did tempt Abraham," &c., contradicts Jas. i. 13, "God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth He (with evil) any man." Is it "shuffling," I beg to know, to assume that a word in the Bible can be used in different senses,—that "one and the same word can be used with totally different senses in a book written by the same Divine Being;" and especially so when the motive (which of course is the key to the whole difficulty) of the writers, in the premises, is patent, and not only the circumstances of the case but the express verbal limitations of the term sufficiently indicate just exactly what was meant in both cases? In Genesis the word "tempt" is employed in its literal sense,—to put to the test. In the other case it is expressly stated that to "tempt with evil"—intentionally set motives before men for the purpose of leading them into sin, is no part of God's method. Certainly it would seem that people must be hard pushed when, in order to make out a case, they are driven to the necessity of dragging up such "glaring contradictions" as these and parading them before the public.

4. It is alleged that the declaration (1 Sam. xv. 10, 11), that God repented having "set up Samuel to be king," contradicts the statement that God is "not a man that he should repent." The charge of contradiction here ignores the fact that the Bible is to be interpreted in accordance with its own genius,—assumes that inspiration requires that every incidental statement in the historical narratives be scientifically accurate, or equivalent to a dogmatic, theological affirmation. Nothing of the sort is claimed. While "holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," this inspiring Spirit wrought not only in accordance with the laws of the human mind, but without displacing even local or national prejudices, when no essential or fatal error was likely to be thus inculcated. Hence not only human qualities and human methods, but even human infirmities, so they be harmless, are sometimes attributed to the Deity. Is it asked in such cases, which statement is to be considered the true, the infallible one? I reply, manifestly the one in accordance at once with the analogy of faith, the general tenor of Scripture teaching, as also the dictates of experience and an enlightened and sanctified judgment.

5. It is charged that the declaration (Ex. xx. 5) that the sins of parents should be visited upon their children, conflicts with the one in Jer. xxxi. 29, 30, to the effect that "in those days every one shall die for his own iniquity." What sort of fairness or manliness is this that denies that, under differing circumstances, seemingly conflicting statements may both be true? The one evidently is simply a general statement of the law of inheritance, and the other a declaration of the fact that, whatever the inherited disabilities we labor under, no one will be held strictly accountable save for his own individual sins—facts, both of which are as true to-day and as contradictory as ever they were.

Several contradictions said to occur in statements of fact cannot be made contradictions—only omissions. Does Luke say that the parents of Jesus did not go down into Egypt? If so, then there is a palpable contradiction. So there is, if he has positively affirmed that the whole of Christ's childhood and youth was spent in Galilee.

Again. From John i. we infer that Jesus so revealed himself to his disciples, that they were satisfied that he was the long anticipated Messiah. In Matt. xvi. 16-20, Jesus charges his disciples not yet to preach, to publish the fact of his Messiahship—he himself, for the time being, preparing to take that responsibility. And here, dear reader, would you believe it? according to a certain modern writer, "is a contradiction impossible to be got over." And these are specimens of the contradictions so loudly trumpeted, and so conspicuously paraded before the public, with a view to demolishing our old-fashioned and time-honored faith in the Bible. What evidence do they give of fairness, of manliness, not to say learning or scholarship? I hesitate not to stigmatize these attempts to invalidate by thus making the Scriptures contradict themselves, as puerile, as frivolous, as unworthy a scholar and a man. The Bible defies the inspection of the world. Can it be supposed that this Book has passed through the hands of the legions of the best scholars the world has ever seen—men who have devoted their vast learning and all their days to its study, without all these superficial difficulties having appeared to their minds, and been by them satisfactorily accounted for? Let this "book of books" be faithfully, fearlessly, manfully, but candidly and earnestly explored—none thoughtlessly dismissing it, or hastily or recklessly casting away his confidence.

[Whether the above is a satisfactory reply to the Rev. Chas. Voysey's lecture, we leave it to our readers to decide.—Ed.]

A bright little boy about four years of age, son of a clergyman, was at your correspondent's house one evening with his parents, and I gave him a couple of five cent pieces. He laid them on the table, and, putting his finger on one, said: "This one I am going to give to the heathen, and the other one I am going to keep myself." He played with them a while, till finally one of them rolled away, and he could not find it. "Well," said I, "my lad, which one have you lost?" "Oh," said he, "I have lost the one I was going to give to the heathen."—Punch.

THE YOSEMITE VALLEY.

[Rev. Henry W. Brown, one of the original founders of the Free Religious Association and a man whom no one knows but to respect and honor, sends us a discourse of singular beauty on the Yosemite Valley, published in the Sacramento Daily Union. The closing paragraphs are a prose poem.—Ed.]

"One feels how natural it was for men to worship in groves—how natural it is now to feel there the presence of the Highest; and in the valley of the Yosemite the feeling of sacredness is real and deep. 'How dreadful (awe-inspiring) is this place! This is none other than the house of God!' The domes (Latin domus, a house), how grand and solemn they are—and other heights are fitly named Cathedral peaks. The religious impression is the one I received from all that strength and beauty; it is the one I would give. The artistic sense in any high degree I could not express, for I do not have it. I am glad to learn from others the exact shade of coloring of beautiful things, as that the bark of the sequoia is cinnamon and the foliage apple-green. But color impresses me, though I can't define it well. I shall never forget a window in the old cathedral of Rheims, which gave me my most vivid conception of color in itself; color without form. It was one of those great 'wheel' windows of stained glass. It was in the western end of the building and the setting sun was shining on and through it. I do not know what figures of saints or apostles, or of leaves or other natural objects, were wrought upon it, for the artist had so ordered his work that the house was filled with the glory of color, in which forms were lost and not missed, and the eye revelled in a beauty which seemed divine. It was divine, born of an art inspired within the soul and of the light of the sun from without. The possibility of being thrilled by Nature through the religious sense is open to those of us in whom the æsthetic sense is not conspicuous. Order our lives with any care, and the divine will flood us in the presence of the grand and the beautiful, as one who knows not in a sonata whether he is hearing the andante or the adagio may be moved to worship and communion. The Hebrews were not artists, but they had the religious appreciation of Nature. It were a pity to have a religion which should diminish that in us. Yet there is in much of the current theology a tone of depreciation towards Nature which has that tendency. I was struck with it when I found that on a Sunday, right there in the valley, a minister was preaching on the 'Insufficiency of Nature.' What a subject for such a sanctuary! Why, a Hebrew psalmist would have burst out in adoration, and Jesus of Nazareth would have found 'a sermon even in the lilies.' Nature is indeed insufficient without the soul to recognize the divine in it, but we need to be encouraged to make that recognition more and more. I heard another clergyman, speaking of his visit to the falls, say that he thought himself 'a fool for climbing up a steep path to see a little water tumble over a rock.' I was not disposed to contradict him, but I am sure there was a flaw in a religion that could leave a gray-haired expounder of it with so small a sense of God in his world. Surely if the religious nature were fully developed, if all its faculties were in healthful exercise, it would yield, in such a place—

Of something far more deeply interfused,
Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
And the round ocean, and the living air,
And the blue sky, and in the mind of man;
A motion and a spirit that impels
All thinking things, and objects of all thought,
And rolls through all things.'

To one whose physical powers are in full activity, a walk up those hills makes the breeze a rapture, and the water he dips from the pure stream is nectar, the taste of which thrills him even in memory. A simple and healthful religion should give the mind and heart a kindred bliss when they taste the divine power and glory manifested in this sanctuary.

I wish we could keep it holy. We do well to preserve it from the desecration of placards which advertise the drinks we ought to avoid and soil the noble rocks of the White Mountains, as the sacred stone of the Caaba—once white as milk—was blackened by the sins of the people. But it ought to be to our people a place of reverent recognition of the Divine in Nature. One would like to be wholly glad that the access is to be so easy; but with stages come trunks, and with trunks fashionable and elaborate toilettes; simplicity is gone, and one who would worship must do it as in our churches, amid a throng of persons of whom many are in the sanctuary only because it is the fashion to be there. Yet true worship is always possible to the true soul, and each one who will may keep himself simple and sincere in the presence of the Highest. The Yosemite should be our natural Mecca, our Jerusalem; not a mere pleasure garden, but a place of pilgrimage, whither our people, in simple garb and with reverent mind, should go up to repent of their sins against Nature; to hold communion with the Spirit that is revealed in her wondrous forms; to be awed and thrilled by the 'strength and beauty' that 'are in His sanctuary.'

This is the style in which irreverent Chicago announces a great revivalist: "Elder Knapp, having converted three sinners in 7.26¼, will rattle with the Fiend next Sunday."

Any place where the mind of man can be undisturbed is suitable for the worship of the Supreme Being.—Veda.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"I have referred to your definition of Infidelity to which Mr. Seaver took exception, criticising it so severely (see INDEX Apr. 12); and I have compared your definition with Webster's Unabridged. You certainly disagree with Webster. You lay great stress on what is equivalent to his fourth meaning, which has no reference to religion at all. And yet it is true that, when Christian bigots apply the term 'Infidel,' they do attach some such meaning to it as you give. Hence so many who have left the Christian fold shrink from accepting the appellation. But after a while—years and decades, it may be—when they become thoroughly convinced that Christianity in all its popular phases is a libel upon true religion, they come to care but little what name is applied to them, and many boldly accept the name Infidel."

—"You will find enclosed two dollars, for which send me THE INDEX for one year. I have perused several issues of your truly valuable paper and believe it to be the expounder of Truth. Many others in this vicinity, together with myself, have a hearty sympathy with the catholic spirit which pervades and animates it throughout; and a firm faith in the principles therein enunciated. There are many, here as elsewhere, who coincide with your views, but I am sorry to say have not the moral courage to openly avow their convictions. Any tracts or publications you would like distributed, if sent to my address, will be looked to."

—"I write you for two purposes: first, to have my paper sent here instead of —, and, secondly, to offer a friendly criticism of your editorial on 'Infidels and Infidelity.' Your position, according to my standard of testing it, is, with very few exceptions, as near right as can be; and your paper I could not think of doing without, because the thought contained in it is rich food in this country where the Bible and Hymn Book contain about the grand stock of knowledge. A northern man can live here, but they (the native whites) don't like the Yankees, as they call every one from the North, very much."

—"If God and heaven and immortality are a fable, I am anxious to know it. I prefer an heretical truth to an orthodox falsehood; but I must acknowledge that to be without hope and without God is a thought horrible to entertain."

INDEX TRACTS

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION have published the following tracts, and will publish others of a similar character, encouraged to do so by the receipt of enough orders to cover the expense:

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no able, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Fifteen copies One Dollar.

Also, the scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition by PARKER PILLSBURY, entitled "The Sunday Question," is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

Friends of Free Religion wishing to assist the publication of such tracts as these will please donate such sums as they think proper, which will be applied exclusively to this purpose. Address—

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Circulars with list of subjects will be sent on application.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FAREWELL ADDRESS

OF REV. CHARLES VOYSEY TO HIS PARISHIONERS AT HEALAUGH, ENGLAND, JULY 30, 1871.

MY DEAR FRIENDS:—

I hope I have not reckoned too rashly on your sympathy and affection in asking you here to-night to listen to a few last words from me before I leave you.

In the midst of my overwhelming duties and pressing cares it was impossible for me to prepare anything like an elaborate address. I would have preferred talking to you in a more homely manner, but in place of that I have written down in a very loose and disconnected form a few thoughts which I desire to impress upon your minds at this somewhat solemn hour of our parting.

It is now two years since I last preached to you from the pulpit in Healaugh Church, but I cannot believe that the general impression which my sermons had made upon a most regular and attentive congregation can have already passed away. You will all of you remember three great principles which formed the basis of all my teaching, and which I am sure you will excuse me for now repeating as briefly and forcibly as I can.

First, I have ever insisted upon your own right to think for yourselves. I have done more, I have urged it upon you as your most solemn duty to your Maker, to form your own religious belief, as far as possible, without the interference or authority of any mortal man.

In doing this I have not only delivered my own soul from the responsibility of leading or misleading others; but I have, as I think, best discharged my duty to God as His minister and messenger. If there is one thing more than another that ought always to set you on your guard against a teacher of religion, it is when he comes to you with the assertion of his own spiritual authority, and either bribes you with promises of eternal happiness or threatens you with penalties of eternal misery in order to persuade you to think as he does. No man has a right to be listened to for a moment who dares to set himself up as the spokesman of God, as having the right to dictate to you what you shall or shall not believe. If any minister, or any church, or any book should presume to make this arrogant claim over your minds and consciences, you are bound to reject it as men. Your loyalty to God in heaven, and your fealty to his voice in your consciences, command you to resist and to reject the insolent usurper of the divine throne in your hearts. Tell him you will listen to him, and hear what he has to say, so long as he speaks to you in his own name and out of his own heart's honest convictions; but if he dare to say, "Obey me, or you are lost"—if he dare to say or insinuate that he has a grain of authority over you in matters of faith and religion, then you will know that God has not sent him, that he is one of those false prophets who "use their own tongues and say the Lord saith," and that he is to be henceforth an object of just suspicion, and every word he speaks is to be received with distrust.

The whole system of religion, as it has been for so long taught in our country, tended to make men lean on the guidance of their priests and ministers instead of learning religion and faith from God himself. They have begun from earliest years to be trained up in mortal terror for their souls' salvation. "Believe this, and thou shalt be saved; disbelieve it, and thou shalt be damned," are the bugbears which have made men run to the minister of religion for advice, just as we run to the doctor in time of dangerous sickness. We have grown up to take our religion at second-hand, and to trust to the word of mortal man instead of listening to the eternal word of God in our own souls. Thus persons who are either too lazy to take the trouble of thinking for themselves, or too timid to walk alone, and too unbelieving to trust themselves alone with God, seize upon the nearest support they can find, grasp the hand of the boldest man who promises them security, and force themselves in blind alarm to accept doctrines and opinions which they would not have looked at without horror had they been left to themselves, and not been frightened out of their wits.

But I urge upon you this perfect independence of thought in religion on higher ground still. If you want your religion to do you good—to elevate your character and conduct, and to be worth living, suffering and dying for, you must make it for yourselves—you must find it out letter by letter, word by word out of God's own lesson-book of life and experience. Out of your own devotion to duty, your own reverence for truth in word and deed, your own neighborliness and friendliness with others around you, your own real love and generosity of heart towards enemies, out of your own joys, and sorrows, hopes, and fears,—out of all these things, if you pray to God to teach you, you will learn, not once for all, but every day and hour, more and more of what God is, and of His great and loving purposes with yourselves and all mankind. I have myself found by observation that this can be done. No one now need say that the task of forming his own religious belief is too great for him. You have just the same sources of religious faith and knowledge that your ministers have. Their Greek and Latin and acquaintance with texts and doctrines have no more to do with their real knowledge of God, if they have any, than with their morality as men. They have no resources for the acquirement of this knowledge which you do not possess likewise. They have reason and common sense; so have you. They have conscience; so have you. They have hearts; so have you. And God is as near to you as to them. Their standing at the altar or ministering to you officially in pulpit or desk gives them not the very smallest advantage which you do not also enjoy in your pews, or in your own homes. Once more then, my dear friends, think for yourselves, and take away with you this beautiful passage from John Wesley's writings:—"We leave every man to enjoy his own opinion and to use his own mode of worship, desiring only that the love of God and his neighbor be the ruling principle in his heart, and show itself in his life by an uniform practice of justice, mercy, and truth. And accordingly we give the right hand of fellowship to every lover of God and man, whatever his opinion or mode of worship may be, of which he is to give an account to God only."

The second of the three great points in my teaching, you will remember, is that whether my opinions be right or wrong, I have always endeavored to make God appear so much better in every way than the older views did. Almost every sermon, every attack made upon popular beliefs, every declaration of my own belief, began, continued, and ended in this, that the dear God and Father of us all is infinitely better than men have generally imagined. If I have rejected a single statement in the Bible as untrue, it was because, and only because, in my opinion, it was unworthy of God. God is better than that, I said to myself, and therefore this is not his word, this cannot be true. If I have rejected any doctrine such as the universal curse of God against Adam's race, and the restoration to God's favor by the atoning blood of Christ, I have rejected those doctrines only and solely because in my opinion they degrade and dishonor God. My ideal of God is far nobler than those doctrines lead us to think Him; and therefore I cast them from me. Sometimes I do not wonder at my being put out of the synagogues for hurting peoples' prejudices and contradicting the religious opinions of the chief priests and rulers; but at other times, when I remember that all my work has been to vindicate and magnify the exceeding goodness of God—to raise our conceptions of Him—to make men admire, and trust and love Him more, and to preach the doctrine of the Prodigal Son over again, I am aghast at the folly and blindness of that opposition which has so long endeavored to silence me, and which has ended in my being driven from this quiet, happy home. I am filled with pain and shame to think that in the nineteenth century any man, however erroneous and mistaken he might be, can be actually disqualified for the duties of a clergyman by his very efforts to set forth a nobler idea of God and to speak good of His name.

But for myself it certainly makes me happy and contented—the danger is that it may make me conceited also—to know that this is the real fact of the case, and that it is, after all, a very great honor to have suffered at all, in such a noble cause. But some one may say, "Stop, that is not what you were deprived for. You were deprived for preaching contrary to the thirty-nine articles—not ostensibly for extolling the honor of God." True, my friend, not ostensibly, but really nevertheless. But just think of this, I attacked some of the doctrines of the Church advisedly and confessedly on the ground that they dishonored God, and only on that ground. You could not separate a single charge against me from this other charge—"You, Charles Voysey, are hereby trying to vindicate God's honor against man's errors and falsehood," and the fact remains that my opponents cared more for the doctrines impugned than for God's honor. They cared more for the thirty-nine articles than for setting the character and dealings of God in a more favorable and inviting aspect. They only attacked me at all, in short, because they knew that their wretched doctrines would not stand a day if they had not. These doctrines could not live by the side of the more beautiful views of God which I have with all my weakness earnestly endeavored to set forth. Just as the chief priests in all ages have set themselves against Jesus and all who, like him, have proclaimed a nobler God than that of the popular belief, so in this case the custodians of orthodoxy have done their worst to myself, from a firm conviction that, if my views are true, then their own orthodoxy is false and must perish—that one or the other must give way. It was only to be expected that they should fight for what was most precious to them. The only sad part of it all is that their conduct to me shows that those orthodox doctrines of God's curse, endless torments, and atonement by bloodshed are more precious to them than the blessed gospel of a Father's love to the whole world.

Now remember, my dear friends, I confess I have attacked the Bible—parts of it—believing that they dishonor God. I have insisted that there is only one God, believing that the doctrine of the Trinity always leads men to a belief in three Gods and that this belief is dishonoring to the one God, the Father Almighty. I have in various ways taught that Jesus was a righteous man, but not less man than we are, because it is dishonoring to God, and is repugnant to the teaching of Jesus, to believe that Jesus was God also. I have also denied the doctrine of the atonement and everlasting hell, because it is dishonoring to God to believe Him capable of requiring, or capable of accepting such atonement; and that it would be not only dishonoring, but blasphemous to God to say that He would be so unjust and cruel as to suffer any one to be born into the world for endless woe and sin. But—it is my boast—I have never felt a thought or breathed a word consciously dishonoring to God the Creator of the world, and the Father of men. To magnify His holy name, to speak of all His marvellous loving-kindness, to exult in His utter trustworthiness as the father and friend of sinners, to rejoice in His wise and impartial judgments, in His fatherly chastisement of our faults, to hope in His boundless and unconditioned mercy to all mankind, and to love and adore Him for His own unutterable majesty of holiness,—this I have tried to do with all my heart,—for this I have given up the early faith of my youth, have suffered the loss of many friends and much worldly good, and have at length brought myself to a bitter exile from the church of my country and my forefathers. Great as I feel it sometimes, it is a small price, a contemptible price to pay for so great an honor. Like the apostles in their first experience of persecution, I can truly say—"I rejoice that I am counted worthy to suffer shame for my Father's name."

If I am wrong in my opinion, if there be a limit to God's great goodness which my enthusiasm has overstepped, if it be possible that a poor sinful worm like me can conceive of goodness actually greater than the real goodness of God—in plain English, if I have actually made God out to be better than He is—why then orthodoxy would be true after all, and God never made a greater blunder in the universe than when He created such a fool as I should then be! An idiot of a man who actually believed God to be a better being than His own creature!—This is really what it comes to if orthodoxy is true. If I am wrong in thinking God so good, and if orthodoxy is right in painting God uglier than unjust men, then this is the absurdity into which you are landed, that some of God's creatures are nobler, more righteous, more loving, more just than He is himself! "I speak unto wise men; judge ye what I say." Can you wonder that I peer into the distant future with something more than a bounding hope that the creed of the coming age will be my creed, that men will not be so insane as to cherish orthodoxy, when it is fairly perceived to involve such monstrous absurdities as this, and that they will be only too glad and thankful to believe all the good they possibly can of the Great Ruler of the world?

My third and last point is that I have done my best to show the connection between religion and morality. I have called the orthodox doctrines immoral, because they do tend in some cases to encourage sin, to speak peace to souls where there is no peace, to comfort the souls of some whom God does not wish to comfort, to make the souls of the righteous sad whom God does not wish to make sad. Sermons against good works I have heard by the score, and sermons which promise to really base and wicked men a sudden entrance into heavenly bliss, if they will only believe in the death of Christ. I have, on the contrary, endeavored to cultivate good conduct and high principle as the best means—nay, the only sure means, as God's own appointed way—of finding out what the goodness of God is.

I have said that the path to true knowledge lies through a willing obedience. "If any man wishes to do the will of God, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God." You know I have never said a word to make light of sin, never have I set forth the loving-kindness of God as the smallest encouragement to do wickedly. I want that to be remembered and acted upon. We are all seeking after God, or intending some day to seek Him, when it is convenient, or when we have made enough money, or when we are older, and so forth. If we are so stupid as to put it off, still we cannot enter that path by any other gate than that which God himself has fixed at its beginning. Whenever we begin, we must begin by wishing and trying to be good. The older we are, the more inveterate our habits, and the stronger our prejudices, the harder it will be for us to begin the search after God, because it will be all the harder to unlearn our false lessons, to correct our errors, to leave off our bad habits, and to give up our base desires. Again and again let me say to you, man cannot know what goodness is except in so far as he is good himself, or desiring earnestly and striving to be good. You may have Decalogues, and Bibles, and Sermons on the Mount, and Catechisms, and all that is really true and beautiful in precept, but learning them all by rote and being able to repeat them like a parrot is not the same thing as knowing what goodness and righteousness are. If God is love, you can only understand that, and know it by being loving yourself, and trying to love others more and more.

You see this is something like turning the world upside down. Heretofore it has been taught, "You shall become good and happy by believing certain doctrines." Now we teach, "You must be good first, or on the road to it, before you can know what doctrines are even true." You can't learn the A B C of heaven and God until you have learned the language of a good child, "Father, thy will be done."

Pardon me, my dear friends, you have often and often stood up for me in your homes, your fields, and your markets. Take away with you these three things, and let the world, and posterity after you, know that Charles Voysey told men to think for themselves, and tried his best to be a preacher of righteousness—of homely work, and common duty, and brotherly love; and that he was turned out of his living because he would teach that God was at least as good as the best of men, and infinitely better still, while orthodoxy said that He was not.

In my long contest, I have received from many of you much support, sympathy, and encouragement. I own with grateful pleasure the regular attendance on the services at the Church, and your patient—even indulgent—attention to what I had to say. It is very creditable to this parish that even those who differed from me deeply have for the most part willingly listened to, and no doubt carefully reflected on the startling opinions which I felt it my duty to set forth. But I look back now with the sincerest pleasure and gratification to the delightful friendship and confidence which have subsisted between you and me as neighbors all these years of my residence among you. Your kind attentions I shall ever cherish in my memory as marks of esteem and regard, which I wish I had better deserved. And it is not by any means the smallest part of my punishment for being true to my convictions, to have to leave behind me, perhaps never to meet again on earth, friends who have treated me like father and mother, brothers and sisters. There is one whom I cannot prevent myself from mentioning, and whose life and deeds, whose struggles, disappointments, and perseverance in the path of duty, under the greatest discouragements, will never be adequately known in this world. You owe to him any possible benefit or service which I may have been to you. The patron of this living has been, under the loving providence of God, father and mother to me and mine. The world shall not know till he is safe out of reach of bigotry and reproach, how much it owes to his intelligent and generous heart. I only say, it will be a very sad day for us, and an evil day for Healaugh, when he is carried to his grave. Make the most of him while he is with you. Let him never have cause to feel that all his work here for God's honor and for the liberation of souls from the tyranny of dogmas has been thrown away upon you. You have not yet made any public stand, you have not exposed yourselves to the smallest danger for the sake of your religious convictions. I do not reproach you for this. I have myself held you back from such exposure. I only say, as I said years ago to you from the pulpit, "The time may come when you will have to take a side, when you will be called upon to make a choice between your own worldly interests and your heartfelt convictions." Oh! for God's sake learn to be men, learn to be brave; learn, moreover, to trust in God, and leave him to fight your battle for you and to provide for all your need, as he has for mine, in the day of persecution. Everything I now enjoy came to me unexpectedly, and most certainly unsought. I am better off to-day, in this hour of my banishment, than when I came to you, nearly eight years ago. I am going up to the great city to sink or swim in the great ocean of conflicting interests. I have not before me the certainty of earning £5 a-year! I have even chosen this tremendous hazard with freedom, in preference to a fine income and easy work with bonds. But somehow I am rather glad than otherwise to be going out into the world once more, leaning on God instead of on man. The longer I have lived to try God, the better do I trust Him, and, above all, the more resigned I feel to His blessed will. When I talk of God's mercy and faithfulness, I am not giving you second-hand information, or only canting out texts. I am telling you what I have known of Him by experience, quite as surely as what I know of my best friends on earth. Religion is not worth having that is not the result of such actual experience. But then if you do not try God, how can you find out what he is? If you do not act so as to prove your entire dependence upon Him, how can you test his trustworthiness at all?

I cannot leave you, my dear friends, without some notice of the ungenerous attacks made upon me for having clung to my position in the Church of England until driven out of it by law.

On my honor I can assure you, in the first place, that I was uncertain all along whether the law would go against me or not. There was some hope that a similar judgment as that in the case of "Essays and Reviews" would be given in my own case—a hope largely supported by the recent Act of Parliament on the Subscription of the Clergy.

Had I succeeded in further widening the liberties of the clergy, nothing but acclamations of applause would have followed, but my failure has, as usual, been turned into a weapon of reproach.

Some have foolishly supposed that I held on to the Church for the loaves and fishes, not knowing that the first seven years of my clerical life were devoted to the Church for nothing, and that out of the remaining twelve years I never had, except for one year in Jamaica, an income from the Church of more than a pitiful £100 or to £120 a-year—scarcely a third of what I needed for bread for my family; and that I refused offers of chapels with an income four times as large as this living. Others, again, have said that I held on to the Church for the advantages of the social position of a clergyman. I beg to remind them that the position of a clergyman added nothing at all to the social rank which I occupied before I took Orders, and which I now carry away with me, and which I shall continue to retain.

My sole object was to liberate the clergy, and to break their bonds. All history testifies that reforms must come from within, and are next to impossible when attempted from without. The most solemn of all my obligations was not that of agreement with the Thirty-nine Articles (which everyone knows are contradictory to each other and to parts of the Prayer Book), but it was when I promised by God's grace "to instruct the people committed to my charge out of the Holy Scriptures, and to teach nothing, as required of necessity for eternal salvation, but that which I myself was persuaded could be concluded and proved by the Scripture." I am not careful to answer my accusers in this matter. I leave God to answer for me whether or not I have done my best to fulfil this my most sacred vow and pledge.

Any one among all the 15,000 clergy of this Church of ours could be likewise condemned and deprived, if the machinery of the law were to be set in motion against him, and he were to be tried without prejudice and without favor. If not, how comes it that the most opposite opinions and doctrines are still taught in our pulpits? If one set be in accordance with the law, the opposite set cannot be. As Dean Stanley says:—"We should all have to go out, from the Archbishop of Canterbury down to the humblest curate in the wilds of Cumberland."

My last words to you would be sadly incomplete if I omitted to say what I hope in most cases it will be unnecessary to say about the Archbishop of York. I know how affection colors the view we take of other people's conduct; and if you feel that my going away is any loss to you, it might make you angry and indignant against those who have contrived to separate us. Now I sincerely believe that few people in the world are more sorry for my deprivation than the Archbishop himself. On every ground he must be aware what a mischief has really been done to the cause of religion, as well as to the reputation of the Church of England, by my condemnation. He is, moreover, a kind-hearted man, and is truly sorry for my misfortunes. He has children of his own, which always humanizes a man, and you may be sure that he cannot contemplate the distressing uncertainty of my pecuniary position without sympathy and regret. All I ask of you is to keep a soft corner in your hearts, and a kind word on your tongues, for one who, after great hesitation, undertook what he felt to be his duty, and a most disagreeable duty, too.

It is not every Bishop or Archbishop that could keep at bay such a crowd of angry bigots as that which surrounded and pressed him on to this ill-advised course. We must not be too hard on those whose public functions lead them to ignore, and almost to lose, their own identity under popular clamor.

I, of course, think that, if the Archbishop had been able to endure the taunts and reproaches of his clergy, he would have done far better for the Church, and perhaps for his own conviction of what was best. But his Grace having yielded under so much pressure, do not let us sit in judgment upon his conduct, or add to his own distress by the imputation of unworthy motives.

I will say but little more about myself. I only ask you for your affectionate regard and sympathy in the path of duty which may lie before me. I shall be once more thrown among strangers, and shall miss sadly and sorrowfully many and many a dear face on which my eyes now rest with loving gratitude. There are many among you whose hearts I have wooed and won; there are still more who have sought and won my love and admiration in return. How I wish I could have done more than I have done for you all, and that I could help you still, if ever so little! But as God in his wisdom thinks fit to separate us, I hope and pray that your new vicar, whoever he may be, will endeavor, whatever be his views on theology, to make your burdens lighter and your path easier than I have ever been able to do. I hope that you will learn to love him, and to help him, and to teach him, as many of you have loved, and helped, and taught me; and that when his turn comes to say farewell, he may leave you, as I now do, with grateful affection and a bursting heart.

I leave behind me a very precious memorial. For my sake, take care of my mother's grave. Let her name remind you, as you enter your church, of what little truth I have been able to proclaim—of those lessons in love and duty which, in spite of my heresies, I have so earnestly tried to enforce, and above all, of that eternal life for which I have helped you to hope. A son's love will bring me to her grave not once only, I hope, before I die; and ties yet stronger than those which bind me to the living, will surely draw me hither again whenever it be possible to revisit this dear and happy home, and greet once more the friends from whom it is so distressing to part. Till we meet again, I commend you to the care and guidance of a loving Father, whose watchful eye will be over us all, and whose loving hand we can all peacefully and securely grasp, led by Him into all duty, and then, in His own good time, into all truth. With such eternal sunshine in our hearts we need never weep.

Farewell! God bless you!

INFLUENCE OF THEODORE PARKER.—The Liverpool Leader, in an article on a sermon by Rev. C. Voysey, says: "We knew, long before he mentioned the name of Theodore Parker, who was the apostle of his faith, and at whose feet he had been sitting to drink in wisdom. Twenty years ago, that greatest of all New Englanders, and one of the greatest of modern Anglo-Saxons, was preaching this high treason against orthodoxy from the pulpit of the Twenty-eighth Congregational Church, in Boston. Whether the disciple is to produce such a revolution in English thought as was certainly brought about in America by the great mind allied to the pure life of Theodore Parker, remains to be seen. No new religion, no new faith, could have had a better exemplar than he was; no purer man has lived in this century; and that his life and teachings have had an immense influence on the American people is beyond all question. We are perhaps speaking quite within bounds, when we say that three-fifths of all the intelligent and educated people in the United States have imbibed more or less of the doctrine of Theodore Parker, and his influence has extended itself to this country. Whether for good or for evil, there can be no doubt of the fact that a large portion of the people in our day who attend, with their families, the services of the national Church, would scarcely like to admit that they had a firm belief in its creed. In fact, we may go further, and say that we have met with hundreds of the nominally orthodox who hold Theodore Parker's views, but have not the moral courage to abandon old associations and ties."

Mr. Lincoln was very fond of a game of chess, and frequently spent the evening with Judge Treat, a near neighbor, in that pastime. Upon one occasion when little Tad was along, the quiet of the game and the loneliness of the room became too trying to his restless nature, and he interrupted the game repeatedly with, "Let's go home, father." "Sit down, Tad, sit down," said Mr. Lincoln. The child kept quiet for a few minutes, but soon broke the silence again. "Presently, my son, presently," said his father. Tad waited as long as he could command his temper, then, starting up in a fit of impatience, he tilted the board, throwing the pieces on the floor and bringing the game to an abrupt termination. Mr. Mr. Lincoln made a stride or two with his long legs, overtook the little culprit just before he reached the door, gave him a partial turn-over, and raised his broad palm. "Tad," said he, "you little villain, I'm going to give you a good whipping;" then pausing, lowering his arm, and letting the child go, he added, "that is, if you ever do it again."—Springfield Republican.

He preaches well who lives well.

HANNAH JANE.

ABEL MERRIWEATHER, REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE THIRTY-THIRD DISTRICT OF INDIANA—LAWYER, WRITER, ORATOR—SOLVES ONE SOCIAL PROBLEM.

[This touching poem by D. R. Locke is reprinted from Harper's Monthly with corrections by the author.]

She isn't half so handsome as when, twenty years ago,
At her old home in Piketon Parson Avery made us one;
The great house crowded full of guests of every degree,
The girls all envying Hannah Jane, the boys all envying me.

Her fingers then were taper, and her skin was white as milk,
Her brown hair—what a mass it was! and soft and fine as silk;

No wind-moved willow by a brook had ever such a grace—
The form of Aphrodite, with a pure Madonna face.

She had but meagre schooling: her little notes to me
Were full of crooked pot-hooks, and the worst orthography.
Her "dear" she spelled with double e, and "kiss" with but one s;

But when one's crazed with passion, what's a letter more or less?

She blundered in her writing, and she blundered when she spoke,

And every rule of syntax Lindley Murray made she broke;
But she was beautiful and fresh, and I—well, I was young:
Her form and face o'erbalanced all the blunders of her tongue.

I was but little better; true, I'd longer been at school;
My tongue and pen were run, perhaps, a trifle more by rule;
But that was all; the neighbors round, who both of us well knew,

All said—which I believed—she was the better of the two.

All's changed: the light of seventeen's no longer in her eyes;
Her wavy hair is gone—that loss the coiffeur's art supplies;
Her form is thin and angular; she slightly forward bends;
Her fingers, once so shapely, now are stumpy at the ends.

She knows but very little, and in little we are one;
The beauty rare that more than hid that great defect is gone.
My parvenus relations now deride my homely wife,
And pity me that I am tied to such a clod for life.

I know there is a difference: at reception and levee
The brightest, wittiest, and most famed of women smile on me;

And everywhere I hold my place among the greatest men;
And sometimes sigh, with Whittier's judge, "Alas! it might have been."

When they all crowd around me, stately dames and brilliant belles,

And yield to me the homage that all great success compels,
Discussing art and state-craft, and literature as well,
From Homer down to Thackeray, and Swedenborg on "Hell,"

I can't forget that from these streams my wife has never quaffed,

Has never with Ophelia wept, nor with Jack Falstaff laughed;
Of authors, actors, artists—why, she hardly knows the names;
She slept while I was speaking on the Alabama claims.

I can't forget— Just at this point another form appears—
The wife I wedded as she was before my prosperous years;
I travel o'er the dreary road we travelled side by side,
And wonder what my share would be if Justice should divide.

She had four hundred dollars left her from the old estate;
On that we married, and, thus poorly armored, faced our fate.
I wrestled with my books; her task was harder far than mine—

'Twas how to make two hundred dollars do the work of mine.

At last I was admitted; then I had my legal lore,
An office with a stove and desk, of books perhaps a score;
She had her beauty and her youth, and some housewifely skill,

And love for me and faith in me, and back of that a will.

I had no friends behind me—no influence to aid;
I worked and fought for every little inch of ground I made.
And how she fought beside me! Never woman lived on less:
In two long years she never spent a single cent for dress.

Ah! how she cried for joy when my first legal fight was won,
When our eclipse passed partly by, and we stood in the sun!
The fee was fifty dollars—'twas the work of half a year—
First captive, lean and scraggy, of my legal bow and spear.

I well remember, when my coat (the only one I had)
Was seedy grown and threadbare, in fact most "shocking bad,"

The tailor's stern remark when I a modest order made:
"Cash is the basis, Sir, on which we tailors do our trade."

Her winter cloak was in his shop by noon that very day;
She wrought on hickory shirts at night that tailor's skill to pay.

A splendid coat it made me; but alas! poor Hannah Jane
Ne'er went to church or lecture till warm weather came again.

Our second season she refused a cloak of any sort,
That I might have a decent suit in which to appear in court;
She made her last year's bonnet do that I might have a hat:
Talk of the old-time, flame-enveloped martyrs after that!

No negro ever worked so hard: a servant's pay to save,
She made herself most willingly a household drudge and slave.

What wonder that she never read a magazine or book,
Combining as she did in one nurse, house-maid, seamstress, cook!

What wonder that the beauty fled that I once so adored!
Her beautiful complexion my fierce kitchen fire devoured;
Her plump, soft, rounded arm was once too fair to be concealed;

Hard work for me that softness into sinewy strength concealed.

I was her altar, and her love the the sacrificial flame:

Ah! with what pure devotion she to that altar came,
And, tearful, flung thereon—alas! I did not know it then—
All that she was, and more than that, all that she might have been!

At last I won success; ah! then our lives were wider parted:
I was far up the rising road—she, poor girl! where we started.
I had tried my speed and mettle, and gained strength in every race;

I was far up the heights of life—she drudging at the base.

She made me take each fall the stump; she said 'twas my career:

The wild applause of listening crowds was music to my ear.
What stimulus had she to cheer her dreary solitude?
For me she lived on gladly in unnatural widowhood.

I to the Legislature went, and said that she should go
To see the world with me, and what the world was doing know.
With tearful smile she answered, "No! four dollars is the pay;

The Bates House rates for board for one is just that sum per day."

She couldn't read my speech, but when the papers all agreed
'Twas the best one of the session, those comments she could read.

And with a gush of pride thereat, which I had never felt,
She sent them to me in a note, with half the words misspelt.

At twenty-eight the State-house; on the bench at thirty-three;
At forty every gate in life was opened wide to me.

I nursed my powers, and grew, and made my point in life; but she—

Bearing such pack-horse weary loads, what could a woman be?

What could she be? Oh, shame! I blush to think what she has been:

The most unselfish of all wives to the selfishest of men.

Yes, plain and homely now she is: she's ignorant, 'tis true:
For me she rubbed herself quite out—I represent the two.

Well, I suppose that I might do as other men have done—

First break her heart with cold neglect, then shove her out alone.

The world would say 'twas well, and more, would give great praise to me

For having borne with "such a wife" so uncomplainingly.

And shall I? No! The contract 'twixt Hannah, God, and me
Was not for one or twenty years, but for eternity.

No matter what the world may think; I know down in my heart

That, if either, I'm delinquent: she has bravely done her part.

There's another world beyond this; and on the final day
Will intellect and learning 'gainst such devotion weigh?
When the great one made of us two is torn apart again,
I'll kick the beam, for God is just, and he knows Hannah Jane.

MRS STOWE ON MARRIAGE.—Well, then, it has been very surprising to us to see in these our times that some people, who really at heart have the interest of women upon their minds, have been so short sighted and reckless as to clamor for an easy dissolution of the marriage contract as a means of righting their wrongs. Is it possible that they do not see that this is a liberty which, once granted, would always tell against the weaker sex? If the woman who finds that she has made a mistake, and married a man unkind or uncongenial, may, on the discovery of it, leave him and seek her fortune with another, so also may a man. And what will become of women like Lillie, when the first gilding begins to wear off, if the men who have taken them shall be at liberty to cast them off and seek others! Have we not enough now of miserable, broken-winged butterflies, that sink down, down, down into the mud of the street? But are women-reformers going to clamor for having every woman turned out helpless when the man who has married her, and made her a mother, discovers that she has not the power to interest him and to help his higher spiritual development? It was because woman is helpless and weak, and because Christ was her great protector, that He made the law of marriage irrevocable: "Whosoever putteth away his wife causeth her to commit adultery." If the sacredness of the marriage contract did not hold, if the church and all good men and all good women did not uphold it with their might and main, it is easy to see where the career of many women like Lillie would end. Men have the power to reflect before the choice is made, and that is the only proper time for reflection. But, when once marriage is made and consummated, it should be as fixed a fact as the laws of nature; and they who suffer under its stringency should suffer as those who endure for the public good. "He that sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not, he shall enter into the tabernacle of the Lord."

A pretended Baptist minister, in Palmer, cruelly deserted his wife under the modern hellism of free love. She committed suicide in this touching manner, as narrated in the Republican.—

"Preparing herself for her death-bed with scrupulous care, she took in her hand the picture of her husband, whom she still loved dearer than life itself, and, having told her attendant not to wake her under any circumstances, swallowed a dose of chloral hydrate sufficient to kill a dozen persons, and slept the sleep of death. She was found next day, but just alive, pressing the picture of her husband to her heart. It was impossible to arouse her, and in a few hours she was lifeless. Nothing more pathetic can be found in the range of romance than the death of this sorrowing, heart-broken woman."—Zion's Herald.

—"I return you the circular with my signature as you request, and sincerely hope you may realize all that you anticipate of success for your undertaking. It is with no desire to be ever benefited pecuniarily that I have added my name to your subscription list. It is because I feel what a great and much-needed work you have been willing to undertake, and to aid and encourage, though in a feeble way, what seems to me the foremost and greatest humanitarian movement of the age. We must have a freer religion, a different idea, or rather I would say a more scientific definition for the word God than any that at present prevails. The word God as used in Bible history seems to me a term for different personages, just as we use the word King in England, or President in American history. Can any one who reasons believe, that the personal God in the garden of Eden, the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the God of whom a man like David was 'one after his own heart,' God the Jehovah of the Jews, the God of battles, God the Father whose tender mercies are over all his works, and the God who is spoken of in Revelations as coming to dwell with men, making for them a new earth, causing all pain to cease, and wiping away all tears, refer to, one and the same Being? Each and all have been ideal or real personages in the history of the race, and I believe that humanity in this nineteenth century is to realize in human form a higher type of God-man than has been conceived of heretofore. But I must not encroach any longer upon your time and patience. We are living in an age of universal investigation and reasoning. One often wearies of thought and longs for rest for the active, busy mind; but there is no rest. It is a comfort to know that we are not alone, that though oceans, continents, and mountains separate us, we are a vast company of sympathizers, one in spirit, seekers for truth. My fondest hope for your undertaking is that THE INDEX may become (unless a better takes its place) the freest paper in this free land, and that you may live to see its sheets delivered daily free of charge, like the manna of old, to feed the multitude with pure truth on all subjects."

—"In sympathy with all efforts which are being made for the emancipation of the human mind from the thralldom of superstition, I cannot express how much I feel for the success of the Index Association. Please credit me as a subscriber for one share of the stock. I would that I could write my name for several, but my means are too limited for any larger investment. Thousands are longing for just such bread of life as the Index Association asks for means to distribute. In the column headed 'Voices from the People,' I have noticed letters from some who enjoy THE INDEX, but who feel too poor to become subscribers. It makes me sad to know that any should thus hunger. Please find enclosed two dollars, which you will use at your discretion for the benefit of any such, and oblige one who is an earnest sympathizer with all seekers for truth."

—"While absent, I ran across a Methodist Camp meeting where I was amused to have one of the brothers tell about losing his watch through having his pocket picked, whereupon he resignedly said—'The Lord giveth and the Lord taketh away.' The idea of the Lord picking his pocket! I simply considered the man to be indulging in PROFANITY, though it would have shocked him, had I told him so."

—"I notice that it is the custom of most of your subscribers to treat you to a long talk on renewing their subscriptions. I will spare you such an infliction. But I cannot help telling you how much pleasure I receive from your brave little paper, and that I hope that it will not be enlarged. I can see nothing in it to alter or improve except the final letter of INDEX, which looks to me very like an r."

CHARLES VOYSEY.

The leading article of our present issue is the "Farewell Address" of Rev. Mr. Voysey to his parishioners at Healaugh, in Yorkshire, England. For this and other pamphlets, acknowledged last week, we are indebted to the kindness of Mr. Voysey himself, who says in an accompanying letter:—

"I think THE INDEX comes as near as possible to my way of thinking, and I am in great hopes that many of my friends will be glad to subscribe for it regularly. We have absolutely no such paper in England. Of course you are most welcome to use my 'Lecture on the Bible.' It is a good service to have published it in THE INDEX."

This "Farewell Address" is sure to enlist the warm sympathies of all who can recognize sterling worth when they see it. Such words as these came from the heart and reach the heart. If speech is any index to character, their simple manliness and unpretentious nobility show Mr. Voysey to be one of the truest and most single-minded men of our times—one whose voice will be heard because his soul is pure. The unconscious magnanimity of his allusion to the Archbishop of York, for whom, although the chief agent of his own deprivation, he begs his friends "to keep a soft corner in their hearts and a kind word on their tongues," will send a thrill through every one who can appreciate the morally sublime. And the deep tenderness, so free from all that is ungentle, with which he speaks of his mother's grave, will bring tears to many an eye. A man who tells the world that God is better than its wretched creeds, and bids it trust most reverently and fearlessly its own free convictions of duty and of truth—a man who, with a large and dependent family, turns his back to all seductions of comfort and competence that he may be true to his own soul,—this is the man that the Church of England excommunicates and bans! Alas, alas for the Christianity that thus turns the high virtue of her sons into a flaming condemnation of her own moral rotteness!

For the honor of old England we are glad to say that there have not been wanting those who are ready to wipe out her shame, so far as in them lies. A little body of friends, as shown by a circular sent us by Mr. Voysey, have raised about $2,250 to sustain him as an independent preacher in London, where he was to hold regular services for the first time on October 1, at St. George's Hall, Langham Place. To this fund we notice that Bishop Colenso contributes fifty dollars; and to the long list of names of the "General Committee," headed by Bishop Hinds as Chairman, Mr. Voysey has added in ink the names of Charles Darwin, Sir John Bowring, and Charles Mackay.

"The Committee," says the circular, "are assured that the proposed public ministration of Mr. Voysey in London will inaugurate a great religious movement, tending to combine a more general acknowledgement of the Perfection and Universal Fatherhood of God with a complete abnegation of all dogmatic trammels, sectarian bigotry, and superstitious ignorance. While large sums of money are yearly raised for the purpose of propagating many conflicting dogmatic creeds, it is hoped that liberal-minded men of all classes throughout the country will contribute towards an unsectarian movement which aspires to make Freedom of Conscience the basis of union for all mankind."

It is well to add here that our edition of Mr. Voysey's "Lecture on the Bible," consisting of eight hundred copies, is almost entirely exhausted, though it has only been advertised four weeks. If we receive sufficient orders to cover the expense, we will issue a new edition; and we shall be very glad to see that so admirable a tract gets the circulation it deserves.

THE SPIRIT OF SCIENCE.

Referring to the question at issue between the advocates and opponents of the theory of Spontaneous Generation, Prof. Tyndall said, in a lecture delivered on the ninth of June last:—"Many of you are aware that I belong to the party which claims life as a derivative of life. The question has two factors,—the evidence, and the mind that judges of the evidence; and you will not forget that it may be purely a mental set or bias on my part that causes me throughout this discussion, from beginning to end, to see on the one side dubious facts and defective logic, and on the other side firm reasoning and a knowledge of what rigid experimental inquiry demands."

This modest yet independent tone, free equally from self-confident dogmatism and supercilious contempt for those who differ, is specially characteristic of the men who now stand at the head of English promoters of science. The more men know, the less will they consent to make positive assertions on questions not closed by irresistible proof. There is nothing harder for an undisciplined mind than to suspend the judgment. It is one of the surest marks of strong and trained intelligence to proportion belief to the amount of evidence, and, even when the evidence seems mainly on one side, to recognize the possible existence in itself of subtle biases and perturbing prejudices. Prof. Tyndall never loses this noble grace of intellectual candor, this high and difficult virtue of a loyalty to truth that extinguishes vanity and mere love of victory. On this special point of Spontaneous Generation, we are obliged to dissent from his opinion on logical rather than experimental grounds, believing that he does not fully appreciate the remoter consequences of his own decided rejection of miracles. If organic life has had a commencement on this globe (and the only real alternatives are a sudden or a gradual commencement of it), then it cannot always have been a "derivative of life." Once no organisms existed on the earth; now they exist. By insensible gradations the organic must have been developed out of the inorganic; and if this happened once, why may it not happen now? There is no escaping the conclusion that it may happen now, except by admitting sudden miraculous creations; which we presume Prof. Tyndall does not admit. Hence the "defective logic" is apparently on the other side. But it is impossible to withhold our admiration from the spirit which pervades his writings, and makes them not only a mental, but also a moral, tonic. After once breathing the air of such pure devotion to truth for truth's sake, it becomes torture to inhale the crass atmosphere of dogmatic assertions.

It is Science, not Christianity, that is the teacher of what might be called the morals of the intellect, by which groundless assumption is made one of the seven deadly sins. Disbelief is the greatest crime against Christianity. Belief without reason is the greatest crime against Science. Christianity sends the obdurate unbeliever to hell. Science sends the credulous believer to the fool's paradise. Christianity bestows her reward on the man who never questions. Science bestows hers on the man who asks the most and the best questions, and thus gives Nature a chance to answer. That is the difference.

AN APOLOGY.

In THE INDEX No. 92, we copied an article from the Morning Star, of Dover, N. H., which accused Mr. Towne of "passionate hatred and indecent blasphemy,"—of having "bad blood" and a "moral malady within,"—of being "audacious, mad, bitter, and revengeful." We made an editorial reply to this article. A subsequent issue of the Morning Star complains of the temper and tone of this reply. On reading it over carefully, with an endeavor to put myself in the place of the editor of the Star, we see that we have been deservedly rebuked for an impatience we felt and improperly expressed. Rev. George T. Day, the editor, is a gentleman of high character and fine abilities, possessed both of "brain" and "manliness;" and we sincerely regret our apparent implication (which we did not really intend) that he lacked one of these qualities. Our only excuse is that we were stung by an undeserved attack on a personal friend, which we felt more keenly than we should have felt one made on ourself. Mr. Day did himself less than justice in making it, and we trust we did ourself less than justice in replying to it in the same spirit. We ought to have defended our friend without imitating the fault we saw; and we tender a full apology to Mr. Day, adding that we think he owes one to Mr. Towne, whose "moral malady" is only to express his unorthodox opinions with a little more vehemence than is consistent with tender consideration for the superstitions of the public.

We thank the editor of the New York Illustrated Christian Weekly for his honorable, prompt, and courteous correction of the misunderstanding he had fallen into (quite possibly through insufficient clearness in our own language) concerning our religious opinions. Such treatment as this, seldom accorded to us by other Evangelical journals, which usually persist in their misrepresentations, we are quick to feel and glad to praise. Taking no delight in our necessary opposition to the religious beliefs of the majority, it is a pleasure to express the respect we feel for a man who courageously defends his own faith, but scorns to do it by a foul blow.

A Western paper is highly indignant because we compared the clergy, a few months ago, to a well-known circus horse which is "blind" yet "speaks." It thinks we had better "take a lesson or two of Balaam's ass." Is the editor a clergyman? If so, we shall be happy to attend his services on our first opportunity.

He who can see no "warmth" in Free Religion is ignorant that its altar-fires are on the hearth of home. All human love is the love of God.

God is not supernatural, but innatural.

RELIGION IN THIS WORLD.

It was a primitive Christian belief that religion and "the world" were in antagonism. Religion, it was thought, came by supernatural grace from Heaven, and it was not to accomplish its mission on earth until the earth itself should be dissolved and its elements, material and human, should be fashioned into a new world. This belief naturally shaped the mode in which the primitive Christians regarded the social condition of mankind, and determined their solution of social problems. It is a fact patent on almost every page of the New Testament (and no ingenuity of exegesis can explain it away) that the solution which early Christianity brought for all the evils and miseries with which humanity was affected, was the speedy dissolution of the entire existing order of things and the formation of a new world as the abode of the expected millennial righteousness and joy.

See how Paul took up the great social questions of his day: and it is worthy of notice that they are substantially the same problems that are agitating society in this our day. The institution of marriage, the problems arising from the distinction of sex, the "social evil," the slavery question, the labor problem, the distribution of property, the prevalence of misery and crime,—all these grave matters, presenting the live subjects that are being discussed in Europe and America to-day, were met by Paul (and the early Christians generally) with a very short and simple method of solution. "I would have you," says Paul, "without anxious care about these things. Let every one abide as he is. Art thou bound unto a wife? Seek not to be loosed. Art thou loosed? Seek not a wife. Marriage is well; but if one can live virtuously without marriage, that is better." So also the slavery question. "Art thou called," he says, "being a servant? Care not for it. The slave and master are one in Christ." Resignation to one's lot of servitude unless freedom should come by the voluntary act of the master, was Paul's instruction to the slave of his day. Mrs. Stowe's "Uncle Tom," calmly resigned to his fate, not Frederick Douglass struggling against his chains and bravely breaking them, would be Paul's type of a Christian slave. And so with the other great social questions. His constant advice is, burden not yourselves with attempting new conditions of life. Trouble not yourselves with the problems of trade and merchandise. The labor question especially had a very easy answer. "Do," said the early Christians, "whatever is needful for to-day's sustenance, but borrow no trouble about the morrow." And then comes, from Paul's lips, the declaration of motive that led to this simple solution of these great problems: "Brethren, the time is short; it behooves that they that have wives be as though they had none; and they that weep as though they wept not; and they that rejoice as though they rejoiced not; and they that buy as though they possessed not; and they that use this world as not abusing it; for the fashion of this world passeth away." The reason is not that he didn't see the inequality, the injustice, the misery, nor that he didn't feel the need of their being set right, but that he believed the right was speedily to come through the intervention of a miracle. What matters it, ran the primitive Christian argument, that some people are rich, well-fed, self-complacent and satisfied, while others are pinched by poverty and crushed by their social condition even into crime; that some are learned and others brutalized by ignorance; that some are socially happy and others wretched; that some are masters and others slaves,—what matters it that all this inequality and social wrong exist, since all these distinctions are so soon to be swept away in the flood of the world's dissolution, and the Messianic kingdom of righteousness and peace, with perfect justice for all, is to be inaugurated upon a renovated earth?

This doctrine and argument in their primitive specific form passed away, as the apostles one after another died and "all things continued as they were from the beginning;" yet the substance of the belief remained to color strongly the whole of Christian theology; and the consequence is that to this day it is commonly taught in the dominant sects throughout Christendom, that rectification and compensation for the evils of this present world are not to be found in this present world itself, among its natural forces and blessings, but in the anticipated new conditions of the future world. Though the doctrine in its old shape has gone, the bad results of it still linger. Setting aside the popular Orthodox scheme of theology which still includes it, how many people there are who, in the practical matters of their experience, are somehow expecting that their bad luck in this present life is to be remedied by a new turn of the wheel of destiny on their entrance into the future life, which is to bring them up and carry their more fortunate neighbors, who chance to "have their good things in this life," down! And all of us at times, perhaps, meet a wickedness so deep, a corruption so foul, that we are staggered at the problem of ever getting it righted by the natural powers of humanity in this world, and we instinctively look away for relief to the future, where beatific imagination can take the place of hard reality. When we confront, for instance, the social problems presented at this hour in New York city,—when we behold the vast extent of the corruption, and then ask ourselves the question, how is honesty to come out of it all and a safe, free government to be secured?—it almost seems as if the only successful remedy must be Paul's doctrine of a speedy dissolution of the world by divine interposition. It seems at least as if it might be an actual saving both of human and divine power, if flood or fire or earthquake could come and suddenly blot out and annihilate that whole municipality, and everything could begin anew on a clean foundation.

But we know full well that divine providence does not work in that way. And earthquake, flood, and fire, when they come, so far from solving any problem for us, only aggravate the difficulty, since they make no selections, but involve in a common destruction the innocent and the guilty. As a matter of historical fact, whatever the theologies may allege, not a single problem concerning social wrong has ever been solved on the theory of divine intervention in the natural order of history. All the problems of life's ills are still here, and they still confront us with their pitiful cry for solution.

And religion at last is awaking to the fact, that, if it would keep its rightful sovereignty in the world, it must meet these problems squarely. It cannot postpone them to a future state, as has been so largely the habit in Christendom, and call that a solution; nor cut the Gordian knot they obstinately present with the sword of miraculous interposition,—for more and more does that sword, so deftly handled by ancient theologians, vanish into airy abstraction when modern hands attempt to grasp it. If religion is to keep its place among the motive powers of the world, it must find a method of meeting the ills of humanity that shall be as real, as substantial, as present, as are the ills themselves, and every way more lasting, persistent, and potent. Not only must it promise harmony and happiness in the future, but be ready to provide them now. It must be able to supplant evil with good in this present state; must prove its power to remedy misfortune and to transform depravity and sin into an integrity and saintliness that shall be fit for heavenly mansions, by exhibiting practical specimens of its work in some of the dark and filthy corners of earth, cleansed and made inhabitable for honesty and purity this side of the grave; and when Paul exclaims—"If in this life only we have hope, we are of all men most miserable," it must boldly reply—"But that is a misleading and pernicious utterance without the balancing and sounder statement, that, if we have no hope in this life, then have we no good assurance for the future." Religion begins to see that only as it proves its power to make this life gloriously successful and beautiful under whatever conditions, can it make good its claim to have found a way of redemption from the evils to which flesh is heir and to carry the keys of the kingdom of heaven. It must show a key that can on earth open the doors of poverty and squalor and ignorance and degradation, to let in the light and health and sweetness of heaven, if it would be trusted as able to open the mansions of God in a future world.

And all methods that can meet these conditions must rest on this principle,—the principle which history and individual experience must be said to have proved, if they have proved anything,—that the world in both its physical and moral features is the subject of law, and that its law can be discovered by human intelligence and co-operated with by human will and conduct.

W. J. P.

SPIRITUAL FREEDOM IN SCOTLAND.

BY J. VILA BLAKE.

BOSTON, Sept. 11, 1871.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Have you room for a rather long letter, containing what appears to me some cheering information for those who have faith in the application of reason and liberty to religion,—the application, that is, of the only method of truth-seeking to the most exalted realm of truth-finding? I am moved to write down the facts by the pleasure and encouragement I find in the same. I refer to the theological movement now in progress in Scotland, and the development of the spirit of reason and freedom there, as detailed in a late article in the Westminster Review.

Scotland is known, almost by common report, as the abode of intolerance, superstition, and general mental degradation in the province of religion. Hardly have Italy and Spain suffered more intellectually from their Roman priesthood than Scotland from its Presbyterian ministers. Yet that hardy country has been no less distinguished for an invincible political spirit and a constant, tumultuous ebullition of independence, which have given its rulers no peace. It has continually resisted, reviled, threatened, banished, imprisoned and executed its monarchs, until it became quite a by-word for disloyalty among nations whose traditions inclined them to more lenient views of the divinity of kings; and, withal, Scotch literature is bold and aspiring. It was no doubt to their participation in this continual popular upheaval, their attacks on the throne and nobility, and their incitement of the rebellious spirit which was always ready to respond to encouragement, that the clergy owed much of the power over the people which they were able to exercise with unresisted tyranny in spiritual matters.

History depicts them as "a restless and unscrupulous body, greedy after power, and grossly intolerant of whatever opposed their own views," but also it testifies that "at a most hazardous moment they kept alive the spirit of national liberty. What the nobles and the crown had put in peril, that did the clergy save. By their care the dying spark was kindled into a blaze. When the light grew dim and flickered on the altar, their hands trimmed the lamps and fed the sacred flame. This is their real glory; and on this they may well repose. They were the guardians of Scotch freedom, and they stood at their post."

There is a story of John Knox, relating to an occasion when that bold reformer was lecturing Queen Mary from the pulpit, probably after his own imperious fashion. The Queen indignantly exclaimed: "What have ye to do with my marriage? And what are ye in this commonwealth?" "A subject born within the same, Madam," answered the preacher, stung by the last question; "and albeit I be neither Lord, Earl nor Baron in it, yet has God made me (how abject that ever I be in your eyes) a profitable member within the same. Yea, Madam, to me it appertains no less to forewarn of such things as may hurt it, if I foresee them, than it doth to any of the nobility; for both my vocation and conscience require plainness of me." A noble saying, let me remark in passing, and one to be commended to the attention of those preachers among us who consider peace and prosperity of more value than plainness.

There is a preacher high in repute, in Boston, so high indeed as to be supposed by many to be the successor of the intrepid and conscientious Parker, who once remarked to me that he had never announced to his people his opinions upon certain fundamental theological points, because, finding them contented and "comfortable," he could see no "use" in "stirring them all up by the roots." Another, a doctor of much authority in Unitarian ranks, avers himself to be "intellectually radical but ecclesiastically conservative"—whatever that may mean; though it can hardly mean anything honest, respectable or useful. The Unitarians, as being the most advanced and therefore those on whom the shackles of creed sit most uneasily, are, I think, somewhat pre-eminent for this kind of subterfuge, at least more openly prominent; but all creed-churches share the blemish. As Dr. Noyes said about that ridiculous failure, the "Boston school for the ministry"—"If they expect to shut out the nineteenth century from any school in Boston, they will find themselves sadly mistaken,"—so it is obvious on all sides that the most exclusive orthodoxy, including Romanism, finds it hard to hold the door against the liberty with which the very atmosphere is alive. The pulpits swarm with insincere preachers who ply their Broderwischen with great success, measured by its appropriate standard, but with great failure, measured by the standard of spiritual culture, mental quickening, and the respect of the earnest and high-minded. Such preachers would do well to add to the quiet and courteous style which the better temper of our time enforces, the upright principle of the severe but honest Scotchman, that "both their vocation and their conscience require plainness of them."

But in spite of political courage and a daring literature, Scotland has served a term of pitiable ecclesiastical slavery. Buckle declares their religious characteristics to be quite unworthy of the "natural tendencies of the Protestant Reformation," and says that, while "the French have a religion worse than themselves, the Scotch have a religion better than themselves." "Herein," exclaims that historian, "lies the apparent paradox, and the real difficulty of Scotch history. That knowledge should not have produced the effects which have elsewhere followed it; that a bold and inquisitive literature should be found in a grossly superstitious country, without diminishing its superstition; that the people should constantly withstand their kings and as constantly succumb to their clergy; that, while they are liberal in politics, they should be illiberal in religion; and that, as a natural consequence of all this, men who, in the visible and external department of facts and of practical life, display a shrewdness and a boldness rarely equalled, should nevertheless in speculative life, and in matters of theory, tremble like sheep before their pastors, and yield assent to every absurdity they hear, provided their church has sanctioned it; that these discrepancies should co-exist, seems at first sight a strange contradiction, and is surely a phenomenon worthy of our careful study."

But a change has been coming over the spirit of Scotch ecclesiasticism, and is even now far progressed. There, in the chosen home of intolerance and superstition, the emancipation of mind that mingles in all the currents of our time has made way for itself. A recent article in the Westminster Review describes the great change. After dwelling upon the remarkable ecclesiastical activity of Scotland, and stating that that activity was never more intense than now, the writer asserts that the growth of large thoughts and purposes and of liberty of mind is to be seen in the nature of the issues now prominent in discussion. They are not, as formerly, mere questions of internal church administration, or church rights and privileges as related to the state. It is now warmly and bitterly discussed whether union shall be sought between the dissenting Presbyterian bodies and whether certain ecclesiastical questions which interfere shall not be relegated to the domain of non-essentials. This is a controversy similar to that which agitates the Unitarians, when they sincerely face their own situation, namely, whether they cannot unite with rationalists upon the basis of the "freedom of the spirit," and honestly put away all dogmatic statements which interfere with the same. That the Unitarians do not claim to trust themselves to the wide waters with the angel of liberty at the helm, is immeasurably to their discredit; but that the question should be debated at all in Scotland, and the tendency to level fences and to hand over hindrances to the realm of non-essentials raise its head, is greatly to the credit of Scotch character and a cheering sign of the times.

Moreover, "the Confession of Faith itself is assailed." The newspapers are filled with articles by laymen, discussing Calvinism and Arminianism, Trinitarianism and Unitarianism; and, says the writer, "those who are acquainted with the social and inner life of both (the clergy and laity) know that throughout Scotland there is a strong, though recent, rebellion against Calvinistic doctrine and the Presbyterian view of life in general."

This rising protest in favor of reason in religion is marked by two facts which attend upon the same reaction here with special prominence. The first is that the Scotch clergy are undeniably "losing their influence over the intelligence of the country." The more educated classes and the intelligent artisans of the towns are not so often to be found in church as formerly. In the country districts the change is slower, and the minister is still listened to as a divine oracle. But even there, "Sunday walks are actively competing with Sunday sermons." The farm-laborer, after six days of hard labor, finds it much more healthy to wander in the open air than to sleep over a dull sermon and through an uncouth service; the defiant shriek of the Sunday locomotive, dragging behind it hundreds of fellow-men bent on making the first day of the week truly a day of recreation, drowns the voice of the preacher who, forgetful of the true Christian spirit which would draw men to the truth, endeavors to bully them into mere church attendance. In spite of the earnest protestation of the clergy, the number of Sunday walkers and Sunday excursionists is rapidly increasing. And the very fact of its increasing in spite of their protestations is a proof of the decline of their influence."

The second point adverted to is "the fact, which it is impossible longer to disguise, that the Scotch clergy do not now include in their number the most intelligent of the Scotch community." "The young men of most talent and greatest acquirement who pass through a university curriculum do not, as a rule, enter the clerical profession." This is a complaint on which sad changes are rung among our sects at present. Here, as in Scotland, the "brightest and best" of the boys, the soundest in mental, moral, and physical health, the most aspiring in endeavors after useful results, find their inclination to the ministry pass away with the time of that "playing church" in which all children delight. And to those who lament the change with the ludicrous surprise and pitiful expostulation rather common in discussions of the subject in this country, I may commend the verdict of the reviewer as to a chief cause of the fact, namely, that young men of excellence "decline to enter a profession which entails upon them either a life of dull evangelical mediocrity or the reputation of unsoundness with its disastrous social consequences, and take to some other walk of life, which, though ideally not so noble, gives more freedom to the play of intellect."

In Scotland they have got so far as to have a company of liberals who are called "Broad Church." That company includes Dr. Smith, who preached to the effect that the decalogue was an imperfect exhibition of morals; Mr. Gilfillan, who "recently, from his pulpit in Dundee, gave utterance to the extraordinary statement that the Confession of Faith, which, as every one knows, is the theological basis of the Presbyterian churches, is full of blunders"—a remark which "fell like a bombshell into the ranks of his fellow Presbyterians;" Mr. Ferguson, who, being accused of heresy before his Presbytery for advocating the salvation of the heathen, "which the Confession of Faith declares to be a pernicious doctrine," made a speech berating the assembly in a remarkable manner, calling on them to "recognize the fact that we are assuredly adrift upon a period of boundless transition—that the sooner we get clear of dogmatic icebergs the better," and affirming that, "in his opinion, countless multitudes of the heathen world will crowd into the kingdom of heaven, while the Scribes and Pharisees of Christendom will be cast out."

A striking fact in all these cases is that the proceedings for heresy instituted against the bold preachers came ignominiously to naught. The Broad Church has also Dr. Wallace, who, in the General Assembly of 1869, astonished all and frightened many by promulgating his view that the Church ought to be, as he himself expresses it, an institute of "free religious thinkers," founded on pure congregationalism, and rid of creeds and confessions. He desired to have the generally concurrent views drawn up in proper form, to serve as ballast to the adventurous explorer, and to be explained to the people by the minister; but every minister might differ from this statement, and express his dissent to his congregation. Think of this proclamation of the "Church of the Spirit," falling upon the startled ears of a Scotch assembly! Again I cannot refrain from a comparison with the statement of like principles in the National Conferences of the most liberal denomination in America. By as much as it is great tribute to the intellectual growth of Scotland that such words could be uttered at all, much more received with a measure of applause, it is great shame to the Unitarian church that here, where the privileges and principles of reason are familiar, like utterances should have been fraught only with anger, contentions and separations. When Dr. Caird, another of the Broad-Church men, gave his "introductory address in the Faculty of Divinity," at the beginning of the session of 1870, at the University of Glasgow, he closed with words which come ringing over the writer to serve for the instruction of those—if possibly they will listen—who still quarrel over their tame imitations of ecclesiastical authority.

"A candid and thoughtful man," said the Scotch professor, "will be led to reflect that it is but a spurious stability which a dogma or theological system derives from anything else than the inherent authority of truth. By this criterion he will endeavor to try even his most sacred traditional beliefs; and should he begin to feel himself, as the result of unshrinking inquiry, out-growing or drifting away from the most treasured opinions and forms of thought, he will resist every temptation to cling to them with a merely forced and formal tenacity. . . . There is no grander tribute of devotion to truth than when a devout mind surrenders to it that which has become endeared by the most sacred associations, and shrinks not from an inquiry the result of which may be, that that which has ministered warmth and light to piety is, after all, but unhallowed fire. Let us, then, gentlemen, rise up to the true dignity of our vocation as scholars and theologians; and that we will do only by absolute, unreserved, self-denying loyalty to truth. . . . Need we fold our hands as if the work of the theologian were ended, and that ever-growing progress and freshness of results, which is the stimulus and reward of intellectual labor in every other system of thought, were here no longer possible—as if the last stone had been already placed on the temple of truth, the last sheaf gathered in from the Master's field? No, it is not so. Long has the church's labor been, but the great living temple that has been rising though the ages is still far from complete; and when, on its stately walls and uprising towers, hands that now write no more have left off to build, we are now called to resume and carry on the noble task. The field where generations of reapers have gathered in such rich results is still waving luxuriant with a perennial harvest of thought, and still to the youngest and latest-come of his stewards the Master's voice is calling—'Go thou also into the vineyard!'"

BLOOD.

We find from the most remote histories that the fluid which circulates through the different parts of the animal organism has been held in more or less sacredness, in appeasing the wrath of gods by sacrifice, and that a wonderful power has always been attributed to it as a detergent from foulness by unclean mixtures.

It was used in ancient times as a specific for Elephantiasis, and goat's blood was used with wonderful success for poultices in bodily pains, such as affection of the spine, pleurisies, &c., and the blood of fowls was said to cure eruptions and various cutaneous diseases. Most nations of antiquity held it to be a sacred thing,—as in fact the very life of the animal, not to be eaten.

Much stress was laid upon its merits by those heathens (so called) who lived before Christ, and fluxes or preparations of it were always kept on hand for the working of miracles, or divination, by the servants and priests of their several divinities; and we read of blood streaming from the side of the goddess Minerva just before the commencement of a great battle. We notice the unparalleled virtues of it, however, after the preaching commenced in Judaea by Paul, Barnabas, and Mark.

The subject matter of their harangues was the great power of blood as shed by the innocent Jesus in Gethsemane and upon Calvary, in reconciling a fallen and depraved world to Almighty God, and receiving from him a pardon for all sins and shortcomings.

Jesus is made to say by his biographers:—"My blood is drink indeed, and whoso drinketh my blood hath life, &c.," which caused his followers to make use of very many kindred expressions, such as—"he hath purchased by his own blood," "being justified by his blood," "guilty of the body and blood of Christ," "through the blood of the cross," "redemption through his blood," "sprinkling of the blood of Jesus," "precious blood of Christ," "his blood cleanseth us from all sin," "washed us by his own blood," &c., &c. In fact they seemed, according to the narrative, continually to ring their changes on the "bleeding Christ," and "the blood of the Lamb which washeth away the sins of the world,"

The priests of fifteen hundred years ago, then, used this great idea of the blood of Christ as their principal stock in trade to excite the sympathies of the common people, and began to inaugurate miracle-workings, such as Madonnas bleeding and bleeding wafers and crucifixes, on occasion of great calamities, or when a poor wicked soul was present under examination.

The blood of the great St. Januarius of Naples was annually liquified for ages, but the priests' thunder was all stolen, when the chemists discovered the secret, and publicly performed the trick.

[The last number of the Catholic World, however, defends this miracle as genuine!—Ed.]

This whimpering and crying over the drops of blood shed by this Jew of Bethlehem in the garden, and on the day of his execution, has been brought down to our own times, and is the all-powerful lever used by sacrificial Christians of all shades to excite the nervous organization of the masses.

No one must reason upon the point, they tell us; no one must for a moment doubt the efficacy of the "blood of Jesus."

If you do not fully believe that this blood was shed for you, your soul is eternally doomed; but if you will only close your ears and eyes to reason and the senses which God has given you, and blindly accept the sacrifice of a part of God that the wrath of God may be averted, then your sins will all be blotted out, and you will be completely washed, renovated and purified by the blood shed at Calvary about eighteen hundred and forty years ago.

You must not suppose the blood shed in rivers and torrents by the millions of the blind followers of Jesus is of the least account whatever; it is His blood and His alone which saves you from the wrath of an OFFENDED GOD.

Why should his blood have such power, when no notice is taken of any other part of his body, especially of his brain, which was the organ of all his mind and thoughts?

Can we possibly conceive of a greater fanaticism? Remember you are not supposed to change your whole course of every day life in order to make restitution for past wrongs inflicted on your fellow men, but you must publicly confess to the world the great idea of Jesus of Bethlehem dying expressly for you; that His blood is sufficient to save you from an eternal death; that He has ascended to His Father corporeally, real flesh and blood; and when you have arrived at this conclusion, you will receive a pass over the river into an eternal glory.

Some of these sacrificial, pious souls believe the communion wine is really transformed into the very blood of Jesus, by some sort of pious legerdemain; and thus this great renovator is taken into our physical being through a special mediation between the Creator and His children by a regularly ordained set of divine brokers.

Instead of relying on the blood of a Jew who perished so long ago for his temerity, would it not be much better to rely upon the quality of our own blood, and totally discard the idea of experiencing God's love and protection by proxy?

AARON M. POWELL.

DEAR FRIEND ABBOT:—

I see by the National Standard that its editor, Mr. A. M. Powell, is about to visit the West, making a somewhat extended tour, and will accept while on the way a limited number of lecture appointments.

I write to bespeak for him a cordial invitation to many places, and a most attentive and also a remunerative hearing. Mr. Powell is well known to some of us as among the most earnest, effective workers for reform of our time. In former days he wrought much in the anti-slavery field, and was there among the best lecturers—and this is saying much where the quality generally was so superior. As a speaker he is eloquent, forcible, strong, rich in incitement and suggestion, full of fresh, vitalizing thought, and bringing everything to the practical applications. None can hear him without being highly instructed, and inspired to a warmer love and higher faith and fulness.

He deals with themes of direct, practical significance at this hour. The public needs, greatly needs, light upon these pressing questions.

If the friends interested at all in behalf of truth and reform fail upon opportunity now to secure a lecture or lectures from him, the loss will be great to them.

The subjects announced are—

1. Agitation and Agitators.
2. Caste.
3. Needs of the Temperance Cause.
4. Subordination or Equality for Woman.
5. Monopolies.
6. Free Religion.

THE NATURAL METHOD IN EDUCATION.

There is nothing upon which conservatism retains a more tenacious hold than upon old, established methods of education. It is the instinct of the father to bring up his son to tread in own footsteps; it is his delight to see in the son his own image. Yet instinctive as this impulse may be, it is none the less irrational, for surely we ought rather to delight in recognizing in our children an improvement upon ourselves, and ought to hail with words of encouragement any educational movement which aims to embody in practice the matured thought of the most advanced thinkers on educational themes.

Let it be admitted that we here in America have sloughed off the old skin of conservatism,—that we no longer desire to see our children dressed up in our own coats,—that we are willing and desirous that they should exhibit better types of humanity than ourselves. Still, in the hurry of business and money-making, we are prone to overlook the means by which this improvement of the stock shall be attained. We leave the education of our children very much to the determination of local and incidental circumstances. We give but little consideration to the method and processes of education. The principle that influences us generally is that the school must instruct, must teach the child, but that his education, properly speaking, must be left to nature, chance, miscellaneous home influences. The schools that have arisen in obedience to this demand aim at nothing more than to instruct the child in certain branches, and generally, no doubt, effect this with a fair measure of success. A few schools modelled after the Pestalozzian plan have, indeed, of late sought conscientiously and intelligently to educate the child; but these are merely Kindergarten establishments, and confine their efforts to the very young, though in so doing they occupy a most important field, than which none is more important. We need, however, schools designed for older pupils which shall make education primary and instruction subsidiary to this. Instruction merely looks to preparation for certain uses,—education looks to the harmonious adaptation of the pupil to all the conditions of life. The only true method of education is, therefore, one which seeks to conform to the general processes of human growth, physical and mental, modifying its general modus operandi according to the specific peculiarities of character. This fundamental truth needs but to be stated to receive at once universal recognition. But what are the processes of nature in the growth of that human unit which is made up of mind and body? This is a question more difficult to answer, one requiring the profoundest study on the part of the profoundest heads. And no profounder head has thought upon this subject than Herbert Spencer. His works are fruitful with suggestion on this important theme. We are pleased to learn that a school has been organized at Eagleswood, Perth Amboy, which honors itself with the name of "The Herbert Spencer Seminary." If it succeeds in its aim to practically work out Mr. Spencer's wise views, it will accomplish a laudable undertaking, and may exercise an important influence in giving a truer direction and a better organization to our educational methods.

Every Saturday says:—"The transformation of solar radiance into life and motion has frequently been eloquently described, but rarely with greater fulness and felicity than by Mr. John Fiske, in the sixth lecture of his supplementary series, which are now in course of delivery at Harvard University. The closing paragraph of this lecture is so singularly eloquent that we must quote it for those of our readers who have not elsewhere met with it: 'When one takes a country ramble on a pleasant Summer's day, one may fitly ponder upon the wondrous significance of the law of the transformation of energy. It is wondrous to reflect that all the energy stored up in the timbers of the fences and farm-houses which we pass, as well as in the grindstone and the axe lying beside it, and in the iron axles and heavy tires of the cart which stands tipped by the road-side—all the energy from moment to moment given out by the roaring cascade and the busy wheel that rumbles at its foot, by the undulating stalks of corn in the field, and the swaying branches in the forest beyond, by the birds that sing in the tree-tops and the butterflies to which they anon give chase, by the cow standing in the brook and the water which bathes her lazy feet, by the sportsmen who pass shouting in the distance as well as by their dogs and guns—that all this multifarious energy is nothing but differentiated radiance, and that all these various objects, giving life and cheerfulness to the landscape, have been built up into their cognizable forms by the agency of sunbeams, such as those by which the scene is now rendered visible. We may well declare, with Professor Tyndall, that the grandest conceptions of Dante and Milton are dwarfed in comparison with the truths which science discloses. But it seems to me that we may go further than this, and say that we have here reached something deeper than poetry. In the sense of illimitable vastness with which we are oppressed and saddened, as we strive to follow out in thought the eternal metamorphosis, we may recognize the modern phase of the feeling which led the ancient to fall upon his knees and adore—after his own crude, symbolic fashion—the invisible Power whereof the infinite web of phenomena is but the visible garment.'"

A Synagogue first and a Rabbi "only after a good one can be afforded," would appear to be the maxim of the Jewish denomination. The Hebrew Observer remarks rather irreverently of those who pursue the opposite:—"These congregations can obtain only men of limited ability, whose sole merit sometimes consists in having a voice leaning strongly towards a whine, in striking a pious, devoted attitude in the pulpit, and in smiling with calm resignation and modest meekness at every person they meet. The congregation also suffers by having long, boring, rapid, shallow sermons preached to them of the milk and water variety—a drop of milk lost in an ocean of very murky, luke-warm water."—Protestant Churchman.

It is impossible to derive happiness from the company of those whom we deprive of happiness.—Thomas Paine.

INDEX TRACTS

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION have published the following tracts, and will publish others of a similar character, if encouraged to do so by the receipt of enough orders to cover the expense:—

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapters and verse in every instance; and no abler, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Fifteen copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. It gives reliable statistics showing that, at the lowest estimate, this system would take about Forty Thousand Years to convert the world; and quotes the highest authorities proving the utter failure of the Catholics to civilize the Paraguay Indians, and of the Protestants to civilize the Sandwich Islanders, in any true sense of the word. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Fifteen copies One Dollar.

Also, the scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition by PARKER PILLSBURY, entitled "The Sunday Question," is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

Friends of Free Religion wishing to assist the publication of such tracts as these will please donate such sums as they think proper, which will be applied exclusively to this purpose. Address—

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Circulars with list of subjects will be sent on application.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

PERSONS AND IDEAS.

[A Lecture delivered in Lyceum Hall, Cambridge, Mass., on Sunday, Jan. 9, 1868—the Eighth in a course of Ten Lectures given under arrangements made by the Free Religious Association.]

No living creature is more absolutely helpless and dependent than a new-born child. Everything must be done for it; it can do nothing for itself. Its very existence is contingent on external care. But, as time goes on, it learns by degrees to dispense with the aid of others, and takes delight in the consciousness of growing power; it begins to walk alone, build its own block houses, tie its own shoes, butter its own bread, and insist on having its own way. When we offer to render some little service, we are clamorously rebuffed with the exclamation—"No, no! let me do it myself!" The infant will develop, long before any signs of conscience or reason appear; hence the importance of a wise and firm family government. The earliest moral and intellectual wants, quite as much as the earliest physical wants, must be supplied from without. Self-control is, doubtless, the consummation of human character; but the first lesson of self-control, the only lesson that the young child can comprehend, is obedience to the authority of parents. It is as wise to address moral suasion to a kitten as to a little child of two or three years old: yet to wait until moral suasion can be comprehended before parental authority is enforced, is to wait until habits of wilfulness have been formed which can only with the greatest difficulty be rectified. The current objections to coercion in the education of young children are too often merely sentimental, and have produced a state of things which justifies the common remark that "there is quite as much family government now as in old times—it has only changed hands." Wherever wisdom rules the household, the child is made to obey, not the will of its parents, but their reason and conscience; and the sole aim of the enforcement of this obedience should be the development, education, and strengthening of the child's own reason and conscience. This, it should never be forgotten, is the great end to be sought; and the only right which parents have in the nature of things to enforce obedience to their conscience and reason, is grounded in the fact that as yet the child has no conscience and reason of its own to obey. The moment that these appear in the child, and precisely in proportion as they appear, the rightful authority of the parent ceases; continued enforcement of authority when the time for freedom has come is simple tyranny. No sooner does the young human being comprehend the nature of the right, the true, the wise, the beautiful, and perceive in these ideas the laws that ought to govern all human action,—no sooner has he passed out of that early stage of development in which mere impulse and passion sweep everything before them, and entered that ripener stage in which the higher faculties assert their supremacy,—than he becomes conscious that he has now attained his spiritual majority, and is henceforth a citizen of the spiritual universe. On his own head must henceforth rest the responsibility of shaping his own character, and of determining his own destiny, so far as this rests on character. A child no longer, he is now a man, master of himself, and lord of his own fate.

It seems plain, therefore, that the normal course of human development from infancy to maturity is a gradual change from submission to parents to fidelity to principles,—from blind surrender to the will of others to intelligent self-control,—from involuntary government by outward commands to cheerful and willing obedience to an inward law. In other words, the passage from childhood to manhood, if a natural one, consists in a gradual transfer of devotion from persons to ideas. The outward law imposed by the authority of parents must be, at the best, imperfect, because from the nature of the case it can only be a multitude of precepts, requiring or prohibiting particular actions; while the inward law, being simply the recognition of universal moral relations, which no more depend on will for their existence than the truths of mathematics, consists solely in a few great principles, and makes its appeal to motives alone. These principles are the ideas of justice, truthfulness, purity, self-respect, self-sacrifice, and the like,—in a word, all the elements that make up the highest ideal of human character; and no person, however exalted, can either add to, or subtract from, their natural right to be obeyed. The moment this ideal of spiritual character is clearly seen, it is seen to be the natural law of spiritual life; and although passion, policy, or selfishness may disobey it, its native right to be obeyed is involuntarily admitted in the protests of uneasy conscience. Hence I say that, while childhood must be governed by persons, manhood must govern itself by ideas; and he is the truest and manliest man who most faithfully governs himself by them.

It by no means follows from this that persons lose all value in the eyes of him to whom ideas have become the sole law of human life. The relationship of the son to his parents, for instance, is not one whit less tender or less beautiful, when obedience to authority has been lost in perfect spiritual freedom. The parent ceases to command, the son to obey; but this relation of authority and submission, fitting as it was in its time, was only provisional, and has now been superseded by the higher relation of equality. Friendship has now become, for the first time, possible; and no friendship can be more deep or noble than that between a father or mother and a grown-up child, in perfect sympathy with each other. The previous official relation, if I may call it so, tends to weaken in some degree the pure force of character; and the spiritual influence of parents is most deeply felt, when the influence of their official authority has ceased.

The same truth holds good in other relationships. The value of great characters, their power for spiritual benefaction, cannot be most clearly perceived or most profoundly felt, until we have come to view principles as the only rightful law of our own conduct. Then for the first time are we enabled to appreciate that self-sacrificing devotion to their own ideal which makes great characters what they are; we learn from our own experience to understand the high cost of that goodness which it thrills us to behold. When freed from the yoke of obedience to persons, and inspired by a voluntary and independent devotion to ideas, we enter in good earnest on the struggle for noble character, then do we first begin to comprehend, by the freemasonry of a common aspiration, the lofty height of goodness attained by those who have gone before. The boy's admiration, undiscriminating because blind, develops into the man's reverence, for we see and appreciate the elevation of others when we ourselves have begun the same arduous ascent. I hold these two things, therefore, as equally true—first, that mature character does not begin until obedience to persons becomes devotion to ideas; and secondly, that the highest kind of help and spiritual inspiration which persons are able to impart cannot be received until this change has taken place.

Such, then, are the moral relations in which the developed individual stands respectively to persons and to ideas. I believe that humanity itself, the race as a whole, stands to them in precisely the same relations. Like the passage from infancy to maturity is the passage from barbarism to civilization—the authority of persons must precede the freedom of ideas, while yet the course of human development is invariably from the former to the latter. In its infancy, mankind was subject to kings and priests, which perhaps was the only condition of what little social order then existed; and the same is true to-day, wherever mankind is in the infantile state. Some nations may be as properly under the authority of Tycoons and Mikados, Sultans, Emperors, and Popes, as children under the authority of their parents; or would be so, if these rulers were as unselfish in the use of their authority as parents commonly are in the use of theirs. On the outbreak of a panic during some terrible disaster at sea, or in the midst of the mad excitement of a mob, any person is morally justifiable in seizing authority who is able thereby to secure the common safety. The power to restore peace and order confers the right to do so, provided the power thus seized is not perverted to selfish ends. Our republican love of liberty, therefore, should not blind us to the fact that not all mankind are yet ripe for it. Authority for children, freedom for men; in the order of nature a period of self-assertion is sure to come at last, when authority passes from the outward to the inward, and intelligent self-government takes the place of blind obedience to command. The time for sympathy and help arrives, when a brave people, coming to the natural stage of development in which they can freely govern themselves, are debarred from free self-government by the artificial combinations of despots. Then, indeed, as is the case with struggling Crete, there is cause for indignation.

Yet, however slowly, such wrongs are sure at last to be righted. The gradual advance of mankind from barbarism to civilization, though delayed here and there by the wilfulness and selfishness of rulers, must take place, and bring with it emancipation from the shackles of tyranny. Viewed in its purely political aspect, America, although the youngest among great nations, is the ripest product of humanity. The old world is still in its childhood, bowing to persons, and with the exception of a comparative minority is not yet able to comprehend the supremacy of principles; while the very spirit and genius of American civilization lie in the transfer of devotion from persons to ideas—the characteristic mark of manhood. The old world theory of government is that of monarchy, the new world theory that of democracy. The one inculcates loyalty to sovereigns; the other, fidelity to laws. In Europe, despite the gradual decay of faith in the divine right of kings, the patriot has been merely the good subject, owing fealty to a person; in America, the patriot is the lover of those great ideas with which his country is identified.

Corresponding with these two theories of government we find two types of public virtue, each noble in itself, but differing as the nobility of childhood differs from that of manhood. The European loyalist, devoted to his sovereign, fired with love for his person, and willing to sacrifice everything for him, although perhaps a rare character to-day, has been described with great power in several novels by Sir Walter Scott, who gives a fine picture of that passionate devotion and boundless self-sacrifice which distinguished many followers of the Stuart dynasty. It is impossible not to admire such unselfishness as that of Redgauntlet, however mistakenly directed. Loyalty to kings has made its heroes in the old world; but, like young Casabianca (for whom I could never help wishing a little more intelligence), they were heroes of the childish type. Of a different stamp is the American patriot, loving free ideas, and free institutions because they embody free ideas. On account of our rapid changes of administration, the American government cannot be so completely identified with individuals as to excite the peculiar enthusiasm of the European loyalist; it is, in fact, little more than an abstraction, an idea, which each administration for the time being represents. This distinction between the government and the administration, the former being a political system, and the latter a number of officials appointed to apply it to affairs, is perfectly familiar to every American, and prevents him from forming that peculiar attachment to his rulers in which the love of country is almost wholly merged in the love of persons. In fact, the American can be truly loyal to his government only in the sense of being faithful to the ideas on which it rests. Justice to every individual of whatever race, color, sex, creed, or condition,—perfect freedom of each, provided the freedom of others is not infringed,—a fair chance for all in the struggle for life,—in a word, reverence for human rights,—is pre-eminently the American idea; and he is the true patriot, the genuine American, who is willing to sacrifice everything for it.

It is said sometimes that abstractions can excite no love, no enthusiasm. But out of this devotion to ideas springs the very highest and grandest form of heroism. Beautiful indeed is the fervent, passionate loyalty of the Jacobite, rejoicing to die for his king; but the deep devotion of the young American soldier, the utterly unselfish enthusiasm of the intelligent martyr for humanity, is morally sublime. Need I mention names? On our own hearts they are engraved, never to be erased while life endures; and I will not wrong the many heroes, so sacredly remembered in our many homes, by naming the famous few. Let their willing sacrifice of life, offered out of calm, strong conviction of duty, be the shining proof of this great and universal truth,—that devotion to ideas is as much nobler than devotion to persons, as manhood is nobler than childhood.

No man has ever left deep and lasting influences behind him, except in virtue of his ideas. Unless these command his sincerest and most earnest efforts,—unless they correspond to the real wants of his age,—he writes his name on water. His real historic influence is the product of two factors,—the power of his ideas and the power of his character; and the power of his character shows itself in the earnestness, strength, and enthusiasm with which he devotes himself to his ideas. These two factors must be carefully distinguished by him who would justly estimate the historic value of persons. Because mankind, as a whole, have remained in the state of childhood, and only here and there begin to come to man's estate, they have failed to make this all-important distinction; they cannot separate ideas from persons, nor understand that devotion to one is not devotion to the other. The great man follows principles; the multitude follow him, not perceiving that the only way really to follow him is to follow, not him, but his principles. His real power, even over the multitude, lies in the ideas he represents and illustrates: but they, fusing together, as it were, the man and his ideas, and hence regarding the two as mutually dependent, cannot comprehend those who distinguish between them and free the ideas themselves from the limitations of the man.

It would be a serious mistake, however, to suppose that mankind can be permanently moved by the attraction of the mere person; it is the ideas in the person, whether they know it or not, that really move them. The influence of character itself, however profound and permanent, is only a tribute from the world to universal moral qualities, existing to some extent in all. The practical mischief of not distinguishing ideas and qualities from the person himself consists in this, that the limitations of the latter are taken to be limitations of the former, and, consequently, that devotion to the one may become desertion of the other. If the philosopher, for instance, imperfectly comprehends the great truths to be proclaimed, then errors cling to the truths themselves in the minds of his disciples, and become perhaps characteristic of a school. It was in this manner that the authority of Aristotle became at last the greatest obstruction in the advance of knowledge, and the first task of modern science, the first achievement of Lord Bacon's great reform was, therefore, the destruction of Aristotle's overpowering prestige. The failure to distinguish between persons and ideas converts discriminating listeners into blind disciples. As the human race develops, it must learn to make this essential distinction, and follow ideas for their own sake, not for the sake of any person.

Here in America, at least, the shackles of leadership are falling off, and the manhood of humanity begins. The Great Republic is founded avowedly on ideas alone, and time only is wanting to harmonize the entire national life with its political basis. No one who has felt the power of those little statuettes by Rogers, and thrilled in response to their deeper meaning, can doubt that, even in Art, a new era begins to dawn in which the inspiration of ideas shall create works of a higher type of beauty than the world has yet known. The young white soldier with his fainting head on the freedman's stalwart breast,—the sad, stern, determined look on the negro's face, as with his strong arm he upholds the bleeding form of him who came to break the fetters of the slave,—is there no beauty there, deeper than that which appeals to the outward eye? The pathos and the power come from the divine inspiration of the American idea, and prophesy, I believe, a great future for American art. The process of civilization, I repeat, is the education of humanity, and it depends in all its phases on the gradual transfer of devotion from persons to ideas.

Is this, indeed, a universal law, or must we except, as not covered by it, the great fact of religion? Must we hold that, however widely it may extend in other directions, it stops short of Christianity?

I believe that even here we can make no exception,—that in the historical development of religion itself the natural and inevitable tendency is from person to idea. He either declines to look, or is unable to see, who discerns not in the signs of the times the indications of a great religious change. The objective point of religion, if I may use the metaphor, is shifting from the future to the present, from the next life to this life. Thinking men are gradually coming to the conviction that theology can tell us nothing of the next life, and that, whatever it may be, that life must depend wholly upon the life on earth. The chief end of religion, therefore, is not the salvation of the soul from hell, but the perfecting of human character and society on earth. This great change in belief is going on quietly and almost imperceptibly all about us; and its cause I believe to be the mighty influence of modern science in undermining the foundations of dogmatism. But, whatever the cause, the change itself is real; the intrinsic value of character for its own sake is more and more clearly perceived, and whatever tends to make character nobler and better becomes correspondingly more and more important.

Is it not clear, then, that, if devotion to ideas produces a higher type of character and creates a purer state of society than devotion to persons, the tendency from the latter to the former must grow more marked every day? Without at all breaking the continuity of historical development, this tendency has already evolved out of Christianity a new and higher type of religion. From person to idea,—from Jesus himself to the Truth he more or less perfectly proclaimed,—that is the unmistakable line of progress, the plain direction of the deepest thought and the profoundest religion of to-day. The supremacy of principles inwardly discerned over commands outwardly imposed, the superiority of spiritual independence over every form of obedience to dictation, the natural right of the individual to govern his own conduct without reference to the precepts or example of any other individual, are coming to be recognized as truths of vital import.

It is clear that, the more these truths are felt and the better we comprehend their application to life, the less can we bend the knee, even to Jesus himself. He becomes to us a friend,—a Master no longer. He may still be held one of the sweetest and noblest and divinest spirits of historical antiquity; but men's relation to him is ceasing to be that of adoring, submissive, unquestioning dependents, and becoming that of admiring, yet discriminating listeners. There is in this changed attitude towards him no depreciation of Jesus, but only appreciation of Humanity. The clearer we comprehend the magnificent nature of Man, the less can we pay obeisance to particular Men; for this nature is in ourselves as well, and forbids all voluntary prostration in the dust. The very same reverence for the soul itself that forbade Jesus to bow before Moses forbids us to bow before Jesus; but in thus refusing allegiance to his person we only confess a profounder allegiance to his principles. His influence is no longer perverted to keeping us children, but helps to make us men; it feeds the fountain of a noble self-respect, and enables us for the first time to sympathize with his own most noble life. He who respects himself too highly to bend even before Jesus can alone begin to comprehend the true greatness of that rare spirit; and I mean no paradox at all, when I say that he is most truly in sympathy with Jesus whose spiritual life is most completely independent of him.

For the sake of rendering more distinct the contrast between devotion to persons and devotion to ideas, let me briefly sketch the theories of these two great faiths, and compare their practical results on character. Christian Theology, properly so called, teaches that the human race, on account of Adam's transgression and the utter corruption of nature entailed by it on all his descendants, lie universally under the wrath of God, and bear the burden of his awful curse, which at death drags down to endless agony whoever has not had its crushing weight lifted from his shoulders by a Power outside himself. This Power outside himself is Jesus the Christ, the only "savior of souls," the incarnate God, the only being that ever lived in human form uncorrupted by the primeval sin. He alone can save from the horrors of everlasting hell; faith in him, dependence upon him, and obedience to him, are the only condition of salvation. Without his aid, all men are devilish and given over to devils; he alone can rescue them in their helplessness. In support of this theology, besides numerous other texts, the words of Peter are habitually quoted from the book of Acts (4:12):—"This is the stone which was set at naught of you builders, which is become the head of the corner. Neither is there salvation in any other; for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved."

Faith in the personal Christ, therefore, as the incarnate God who alone can save from hell, is the very essence of Christianity; and it is easy to see why its first and last word is—"Come to Jesus!" In fact, to Christian believers, the Christ is Christianity; his person is everything, and his ideas are comparatively nothing. The whole duty of the Christian is thus condensed into the suppression of his own will, and the absolute surrender of himself to the will of his Lord; and the highest Christian perfection consists in devout imitation of him. This duty and its corresponding affections are enjoined with the utmost clearness in the fourth gospel on all disciples; Christ himself is the Life, the Truth, and the Way, the parent vine from which the branches derive all their vitality. In the famous "Imitation of Christ," by Thomas a Kempis, a work which, next to the Bible, has, we are told, passed through more editions than any other book, we find the same ideal of Christian duty held up, the same extinction of individual will required:—"It is a great matter to live in obedience, to be under a superior, and not to be at our own disposing. It is much safer to obey than to govern. Go whither thou wilt, thou wilt find no rest but in humble subjection under the government of a superior. (Bk. 1, ch. 9). Jesus will be loved alone above all things. Thy Beloved is of that nature that he will have thy heart alone, and sit on his own throne as King. (Bk. 2, ch. 7). My son, he that endeavoreth to withdraw himself from obedience, withdraweth himself from Grace. &c., &c." It would be easy to quote more to the same effect from this typical book of Thomas a Kempis, which, perhaps, more than any other utters the very heart of historical Christianity; but this is sufficient. If anything is plain, it is that the very essence of a living Orthodoxy is absolute submission to the will of Jesus, perfect love for his person, undoubting faith in him as the only Savior from hell.

Now the practical effect of this theology in minds deeply impressed by it must, as both logic and actual observation prove, be as follows. First, a state of extreme terror is produced in the soul, by the contemplation of its frightful peril, followed by a wild and frantic endeavor to "flee from the wrath to come;" this is what is called "conviction of sin." Afterwards comes the natural reaction, a blind and helpless throwing of oneself at the feet of Jesus, as the "only and sufficient Savior;" this is what is called "conversion." It is true, the overstrained mind, instead of being converted, sometimes goes crazy. Out of fifty persons admitted into an English Insane Asylum by Dr. Maudsley, seven were directly or indirectly the victims of the Christian theology; two of them went mad immediately after hearing violent revival sermons. These cases are, of course, comparatively rare. But the effect on character, even when madness is not produced, is too often pernicious. If simple attachment to Jesus, and faith in his power to save the soul without its own exertions, are made the one essential thing, the importance of a vigorous will acting independently according to true moral relations in life is fearfully underrated; and a tendency, at least, must exist to become careless of these relations. The value of individuality, of a true independence of character, must be greatly lessened; and, as a fact, individual character is often regarded as of secondary moment. Thus devotion to the mere person of Jesus, although perfectly sincere, may be, and sometimes is, a serious detriment to character. He who cannot easily supply illustrations of this fact in his own mind, must have had a small experience of men in general and of church-members in particular. Of the better effects on character produced by this devotion to the person of Jesus, I will speak by and by. But if, when this complete self-surrender to the will of Jesus is realized in practice, the character is thereby improved, the improvement is manifestly owing, not to the disciple's own independent virtue, but to the fact that the commands of his master happen to be what they are. If they had been different, the same obedience to them must have produced deterioration, not improvement. Hence the conclusion cannot be avoided, that, whatever other good effects on character are wrought by devotion to the person of Jesus and absolute submission to his will, they render a true self-reliance and manly independence impossible. Well says the great Goethe, that this world "has few voices and many echoes."

With the Christian theology and its practical results, let us compare what, to avoid offensive party names, I will simply call spiritual Theism. According to this, the mysterious Origin of All Being, immanent throughout the entire universe, has laid no curse on any part of the universe, least of all on Man, its noblest evolution. All that we can ever learn of the great Mystery we name God, is offered to us in the system of universal Nature; and if any part of this deserves to be called God-like or divine, it is human nature itself. If thought, will, and affection are indeed the highest manifestation of the one Force which fills all Time and Space, then for the profoundest revelation of this Force we must go where alone thought, will, and affection are immediately made known to us—in our own souls. In some incomprehensible way, the soul is in its depths one with this universal, omnipresent, all pervading life; and in its highest, purest experiences it becomes in some sort conscious of this its origin. The laws of human development are the laws of God; the secret forces which cause it are God himself. The floods of life which perpetually well upwards from the depths of the soul, and appear on its surface as the innumerable waves of consciousness, are the constant manifestations of the highest form of Force we know; and surely it is no dogmatic arrogance, no shallow assertion of presumptuous conceit, to say that our deepest and truest knowledge of this one universal Force must come from within. This is what is meant by the immanence of God in the soul; and when Christians announce the amazing and solitary miracle of his incarnation in Jesus, we would announce the more amazing and perpetual law of his incarnation in Humanity. If a Power anywhere exists which we are justified in calling by the great name of God, then for us it must pre-eminently exist in the depths of our own souls; and the truest worship of it must consist in reverence for moral being, obedience to its laws, and development of its powers. Every soul stands as near to God as every other; and its most sincere and pure religion lies in working out independently its individual character, and thus fulfilling its highest nature. All help, comfort, inspiration flow through the natural channels of our own faculties—come to us from within; and he is most truly dependent upon God who in his outward and inward life is most completely independent of his fellows. Herein consists all religion that is not folly, or worse,—the finding of the Divine in itself by the private soul, and the putting of it forth into the world in the beauty of living character.

The practical effect of this view of religion, making character, as it does, the chief end of all human effort, must be self-evident; it must directly tend to foster independence both of thought and action, and thus realize that intelligent self-control which is the first condition of high character. The thinker, as such, can have but one passion—the passion for truth; and in pursuit of spiritual truth he will rest satisfied with first-hand conclusions alone. Hence the words of Jesus will come to him with no authority but the intrinsic authority of his ideas; the influence of his person, life, and character, so far as truth alone is concerned, must go for nothing. But so far as his influence tends to strengthen and deepen the love of truth, it is, and will forever be, a great and vital inspiration. So also with regard to action. The great soul cannot act with reference to any example,—cannot lower itself to be an imitator; it must always apply with independence its own ideas of right to each particular case of duty, and decide upon the true and ideal course irrespective of the decisions of any other. The lawful influence of the example of Jesus cannot extend beyond intensifying the love of right, and must stop short of convincing us that any particular action is right. In other words, the power of his person becomes oppressive and despotic, if it does more than to increase independent devotion to his ideas. The practical effect on character, therefore, of pure Theism is to develop a robust and hardy independence, both of thought and action, and thus, as I conceive, to lay the only possible foundation for character that deserves the epithet noble.

Between historical Christianity and spiritual Theism, which are based respectively on devotion to the person of Jesus, and devotion to universal ideas, there is a feeble attempt at a compromise between them, the so-called "Liberal Christianity." The book entitled "Ecce Homo," which not long ago won so much notice, exactly represents the attitude of the "Liberal Christian" sects, so far as expressed in their organizations, and falls into precisely the same contradiction. On the one hand, it declares Jesus to be a divinely appointed law-giver for the entire Christian community; yet, on the other hand, it declares that every Christian must be a law to himself. There is here a very plain contradiction; and I can conceive of but one method of attempting to explain it away. It may be said that Jesus, in laying down the law that is to bind his followers, simply enjoined upon them obedience to their own inward law. But the mistake lies in supposing that he had any authority to make this injunction, as a law-giver. To do so would be to issue the irrational edict—"I command you to command yourselves." Our right to command ourselves according to ideas rests on no permission or injunction of Jesus; it rests on the nature of things—is our divine birthright as spiritual beings. Here, in this same contradiction which renders practically valueless the results of "Ecce Homo," lies also the practical weakness of the Liberal Christian sects; they all assert, in the same breath, the authority of the Lord Jesus and perfect freedom of thought and conscience. Between these men must choose; and to see them clinging to both is as humiliating as it is ludicrous. From devout extinction of character at the feet of Jesus to a more truly devout development of it on our own feet,—that is the line of march which humanity pursues; and if it halts at any intermediate point, it is simply a bivouac for the night. With the dawn of day it will break camp, and move on.

It is, notwithstanding, perfectly true that the submissive, meek, self-sacrificing devotion to the person of Jesus which has been the inspiration of historical Christianity creates a type of heroism, a form of character, which has its own peculiar beauty. Some of the Catholic saints, St. Francis of Assisi in especial, and some of the Jesuit missionaries, as St. Francis Xavier, were prodigies of self-humiliation and self-sacrifice for the sake of Jesus. Or, to come nearer home, we all doubtless know many a saintly spirit whose life is spent in lowly services to the lowly, in the hope that, by thus caring for his little ones, it may render, according to his word, some slight service to Jesus himself. The aroma of this pious love for him is beautiful and sweet indeed, and far be it from me to depreciate it. The tender grace and loveliness of character it creates, however, is like the smooth and rounded cheek of childhood, fair in its season, but destined, if nature has its course, to develop into the bearded face of manhood. In vain are the innocence and obedience of the child held up as the ideal character of the man. Virtue must take the place of innocence, independence must take the place of obedience. Not fond affection for Jesus, or meek submission to his yoke, is the highest inspiration of adult men and women, but rather a deep and burning and unselfish devotion to the great principles which make each true soul the master of itself. Never shall we come up to the full stature of humanity, until we glow with enthusiasm for ideas, and make these the deep fountain-head of self-sacrificing and universal love for Man.

KINGS AND COURTIERES.

[From the "Miscellaneous Works of William Hazlitt," Vol. 1, pp. 177-181.]

As kings have the sagacity of pride, courtiers have the cunning of fear. They watch their own behavior and that of others with breathless apprehension, and move amidst the artificial forms of court-etiquette as if the least error must be fatal to them. Their sense of personal pride is heightened by servility: every faculty is wound up to flatter the vanity and prejudices of their superiors.

When Coates painted a portrait in crayons of Queen Charlotte, on her first arrival in this country, the king, followed by a train of attendants, went to look at it. The trembling artist stood by. "Well, what do you think?" said the king to those in waiting. Not a word in reply. "Do you think it like?" Still all was hushed as death. "Why, yes," he added, "I think it is like, very like." A buzz of admiration instantly filled the room; and the old Duchess of Northumberland, going up to the artist, and tapping him familiarly on the shoulder, said, "Remember, Mr. Coates, I am to have the first copy!" On another occasion, when the Queen had sat for her portrait, one of the maids of honor, coming into the room, courted to the reflection in the glass, affecting to mistake it for the Queen. The picture was, you may be sure, a flattering likeness.

In the memoirs of Count Grammont it is related of

Louis XIV. that, having a dispute at chess with one of his courtiers, no one present would give an opinion. "Oh," said he, "here comes Count Hamilton, he shall decide which of us is in the right." "Your Majesty is in the wrong," replied the Count, without looking at the board. On which the King remonstrating with him on the impossibility of his judging till he saw the state of the game, he answered—"Does your Majesty suppose that, if you were in the right, all these noblemen would stand by and say nothing?"

A king was once curious to know which was tallest, himself or a certain courtier. "Let us measure," said the king. The king stood up to be measured first; but when the person who was fixed upon to take their height came to measure the nobleman, he found it quite impossible, as he first rose on tiptoe, then crouched down, now shrugged up his shoulders to the right, then twisted his body to the left. Afterwards his friend asking him the reason of these unaccountable gesticulations, he replied—"I could not tell whether the king wished me to be taller or shorter than himself; and all the time I was making those odd movements, I was watching his countenance to see what I ought to do."

If such is the exquisite pliability of the inmates of a court in trifles like these, what must be their independence of spirit and disinterested integrity in questions of peace and war, that involve the rights of sovereigns or the liberties of the people! It has been suggested (and not without reason) that the difficulty of trusting to the professions of those who surround them, is one circumstance that renders kings such expert physiognomists, the language of the countenance being the only one they have left to decipher the thoughts of others; and the very disguises which are practised to prevent the emotions of the mind from appearing in the face only render them more acute and discriminating observers.

It is the same insincerity and fear of giving offence by candor and plain-speaking in their immediate dependents, that makes kings gossips and inquisitive. They have no way of ascertaining the opinions of others but by getting them up into a corner, and extorting the commonest information from them, piecemeal, by endless, teasing, tiresome questions and cross-examination. The walls of a palace, like those of a convent, are the favored abode of scandal and tittle-tattle. The inhabitants of both are equally shut out from the common privileges and common incidents of humanity, and whatever relates to the every-day world about us has to them the air of romance. The desire which the most meritorious princes have shown to acquire information on matters of fact rather than of opinion is partly because their prejudices will not suffer them to exercise their understanding freely on the most important speculative questions, partly from their jealousy of being dictated to on any point that admits of a question; as, on the other hand, the desire which the sovereigns of northern and uncultivated kingdoms have shown to become acquainted with the arts and elegances of life in southern nations is evidently owing to their natural jealousy of the advantages of civilization over barbarism. From the principle here stated, Peter the Great visited this country, and worked in our dock-yards as a common shipwright. To the same source may be traced the curiosity of the Duchess of Oldenburgh to see a beef-steak cooked, to take a peep into Mr. Meaux's great brewing-vat and to hear Mr. Whitbread speak!

The common regal character is, then, the reverse of what it ought to be. It is the purely personal, occupied with its own petty feelings, prejudices, and pursuits; whereas it ought to be the purely philosophical, exempt from all personal considerations, and contemplating itself only in its general and paramount relation to the State. This is the reason why there have been so few great kings. They want the power of abstraction; and their situations are necessarily at variance with their duties in this respect; for everything forces them to concentrate their attention upon themselves, and to consider their rank and privileges in connection with their private advantage, rather than with public good. This is but natural. It is easier to employ the power they possess in pampering their own appetites and passions, than to wield it for the benefit of a great empire. They see well enough how the community is made for them, not so well how they are made for the community. Not knowing how to act as stewards for their trust, they set up for heirs to the estate, and waste it at their pleasure. Without aspiring to reign as kings, they are content to live as sponges upon royalty. A great king ought to be the greatest philosopher and the truest patriot in his dominions: hereditary kings can be but common mortals. It is not that they are not equal to other men, but to be equal to their rank as kings they ought to be more than men. Their power is equal to that of the whole community: their wisdom and virtue ought to keep pace with their power. But in ordinary cases, the height to which they are raised, instead of enlarging their views or ennobling their sentiments, makes them giddy with vanity and ready to look down on the world which is subjected to their power, as the plaything of their will. They regard men crawling on the face of the earth as we do the insects that cross our path, and survey the common drama of human life as a fantocini exhibition got up for their amusement. There is no sympathy between kings and their subjects, except in a constitutional monarchy like ours, through the medium of Lords and Commons. Take away that check upon their ambition and rapacity, and their pretensions become as monstrous as they are ridiculous. Without the common feelings of humanity in their own breasts, they have no regard for them in their aggregate amount and accumulating force. Beginning in contempt of the people, they would crush and trample upon all power but their own. They consider the claims of justice and compassion as so many impertinent interferences with the royal prerogative. They despise the millions of slaves whom they see linked to the foot of the throne; and they soon hate what they despise. They will sacrifice a kingdom for a caprice, and mankind for a bauble. Weighed in the scales of their pride, the meanest things become of the greatest importance: weighed in the balance of reason, the universe is nothing to them. It is this overweening, aggravated, intolerable sense of swelling pride and ungovernable self-will, that sometimes disorders their imaginations; as it is their blind fatuity and insensibility to all beyond themselves that, transmitted through successive generations and confirmed by regal intermarriage, in time makes them idiots. When we see a poor creature like Ferdinand VII, who can hardly gabble out his words like a human being, more imbecile than a woman, more hypocritical than a priest, decked and dandled in the long robes and swaddling clothes of Legitimacy, lulled to rest with the dreams of superstition, drunk with the patriot-blood of his country, and launching the thunders of his coward-arm against the rising liberties of a New World, while he claims the style and title of image of the Divinity, we may laugh or weep, but there is nothing to wonder at. Tyrants forego all respect for humanity in proportion as they are beneath it. Taught to believe themselves of a different species, they really become so, lose their participation with their kind, and, in mimicking the God, dwindle into the brute.

"Enclosed please find twenty dollars, and send a copy of THE INDEX to each address below. I have read your paper for the year past with so much salvation of soul to myself, that I have been anxious others should receive a like benefit; but in my efforts I have to run the gauntlet of the prayers, exhortations, and expostulations of the Orthodox fraternity to their followers to withstand an audacious attempt to disseminate infidel publications. One very worthy Deacon felt constrained to make the grave statement that a bundle of those papers, THE INDEX, were sent to his neighbor's house. The man's wife implored her husband not to open them; but, he regretted to say, the advice was not heeded, and they were opened, the fire broke out, THE INDEX was read! There is here a class of religionists who habitually meet for self-abasement, proclaiming themselves to one another the vilest of beings, while saying to others in their demeanor—"I am holier than thou"—detaching and vilifying this world, yet contriving to enjoy with the worst of us, and exerting an influence that has made the religious heavens of this region as brass over our heads and its earth as iron under our feet. Still I despair not, but hope and trust that these few copies of your paper may be the first patterings of that shower which shall ere long clothe these Orthodox fields with verdure and make this wilderness of superstition blossom as the rose."

"I am anxious to preserve all the numbers for the purpose of binding, and with the above exceptions have done so. The first volume I have already bound. Will you please look into the matter and have the trouble, wherever it is, remedied, and forward the missing numbers."

"A friend of mine subscribed for THE INDEX for me for three months. The time has now expired. Please stop the paper. I do not agree with your Free Religious views, and do not want your paper."

"It seems the West must furnish the truth necessary to ventilate and disinfect decaying Christianity."

"BUT THE LORD WAS NOT IN THE FIRE."

What could ever strike dumb the mouth of man, if not the awful doom of Chicago? The proudest city of the West swallowed up in a night, by such a sea of fire as never before on this continent surged over human homes! What a wilderness of woe made at one stroke in the very garden of plenty and peace! Imagination is aghast at such mountainous misery, and turns away from the scene sick and faint.

Is there no pity in the heart of God for the agonies of mankind? Can he look on in apathy while a whole city, full of helpless men, women, and children, is convulsed with terror and pain? What becomes, in such a moment, of all our cherished faith in his Fatherhood? Where has He vanished who lets not a sparrow fall to the ground without his care? Must we bid good-by forever to the sweet dream of a Divine Benignity that laps a universe in love, and heals each broken and bleeding heart with the balm of an infinite compassion? Must our childish prayers of trust and tender confidence, lisped at our mothers' knees, be turned into the mute despair, the bitterness too intense for words, of a manhood undecieved? Is that the lesson? And must we learn it?

Say what we will, such thoughts are stirring in millions of minds to-day. The churches preach and pray in vain. Let us have done with shams. The prayers for rain that all day long on that awful Sunday went up from affrighted thousands—the wild, passionate, agonized supplications for the blessed storm-clouds of heaven that then, if ever, burst forth from hearts sincere,—what did they avail? Not till the dread Destroyer had glutted himself with ruin, and licked up with fiery tongue the blood of the victim till he could lick no more, were the windows of heaven opened and the floods poured down. The inflexible laws of Nature must hold their course, unhurried, unretarded, though the whole human race had knelt together on the hot, dusty ground, to pour forth from white lips one long, frantic, piercing wail of terrified entreaty. Onward must roll the great wheels of Nature's universal mechanism, hard as steel, resistless as fate, deaf as the grave.

Brothers! this is the reality. If we can find no God in it, we shall find none out of it. If human will or wish or cry rises up against the uniformity and changelessness of natural law,—if this only is praying,—then there is no God that "heareth prayer." The heart of humanity is wounded and bleeds, because of increasing knowledge that the God of the churches is a dream of the past. It has not learned faith in the God that is real—the God that is the unity and the beauty and the benignity of Nature itself, the God that could not without suicide invert its order or disturb its harmony at human call. This terrible burden of human misery that so appals our hearts, and perhaps breaks them, is a part of Nature. We must bear it as best we may. Prayer saves us from none of it. But we are false to Nature, if we bear it ignobly. It is our business so to live, or so to die, that the highest or spiritual laws of Nature shall be utterly fulfilled in our own being. It is our chief wisdom to make all the experiences and lessons of life, all its haps and mishaps whether to ourselves or to others, a process of perpetual education into a grander humanity. Until we thus identify our own wills with the great will of Nature, and accept its perfect law as also our own dearest end and aim, we shall find no God in Nature or in life, and, if we have lost faith in the God of the churches, we shall find no God at all. But if we do thus unite ourselves to the system of Nature as part and parcel of it, seeking only to reflect its vast harmony in our little lives, then all our human experience becomes lit up from within, and the Great Spirit of Nature fills us with a peace that is victory itself. Then we pray for nothing, but bear everything, subduing it to our own growth in all that is most highly human.

It is by these ideas that we escape the staggering, crushing weight of such an event as has just darkened the land. To the Christian it is an inscrutable, terrible, and terrifying visitation of God, to be submitted to, but not understood. To us, it is part of Nature's divine process of educating mankind. Only by such catastrophes is the world taught wisdom, strength, charity. Out of this disaster men will pluck precaution, foresight, and, above all, a deeper and tenderer sympathy for their kind. Chicago's suffering brings suffering to the whole nation, and the bonds of human brotherhood have been knit by it already as never before. The great cry of pity and sorrow that went up from this people when the awful news was heard,—the swift, heartfelt offers and acts of aid that poured in upon the city wailing in its own ashes,—the sentiment of our common humanity that welled up in every heart, and brought a nation to their feet as with one accord in eagerness to mitigate and rescue,—is there no God in all this? Only thus have men ever learned the highest virtues of humanity.

We do not say that God purposed this terrific calamity to Chicago in order to teach the rest of us the virtues we lack—far from it. We leave it to the clergy to prate about God's purposes. But we see that such disasters do teach mankind more wisdom and virtue than they would ever learn without them. We take the fact as it stands, as a part of Nature's most stern but salutary tuition—one of the hard bruises by which infant man is taught to use his faculties to more and better effect, and without which he would learn nothing.

If, then, as we believe, there is in Nature an immanent, Divine Intelligence, aiming at the education of man as part of the higher evolution of the universe, even such horrible catastrophes as this, notwithstanding the unheeded prayers and frantic cries of the multitudes that suffer, have no power to shake our confidence in his goodness. Man must learn to be a law to himself; he must first learn to heed the laws of Nature under which he lives—learn wisdom by his mistakes, foresight by his own miseries, and pity by the sight of the miseries of others. Pain we see to be a necessary part of every experience that shall develop a larger manhood in the individual and the race; and if a large development of humanity is an object dear to Nature, we see that the existence of pain is not in itself a disproof of her beneficence. Pain is the price of knowledge, of virtue, of all that is of permanent value; and the inexorability of natural law, forbidding all hope to escape pain by unwise and useless prayers, is at least consistent with the higher idea of God that is born of Free Religion.

In the old Hebrew Scriptures there is nothing more grand than the story of Elijah in the wilderness:—"And he said, Go, forth, and stand upon the mount before the Lord. And behold, the Lord passed by, and a great and strong wind rent the mountains, and brake in pieces the rocks before the Lord; but the Lord was not in the wind. And after the wind an earthquake; but the Lord was not in the earthquake. And after the earthquake a fire; but the Lord was not in the fire. And after the fire a still, small voice. And it was so, when Elijah heard it, that he wrapped his face in his mantle, and went out, and stood in the entering-in of the cave."

"But the Lord was not in the Fire!" So teaches the Bible. So echoes, in to-day's agony and despair, many and many a breaking human heart. But, with all the strength and energy of our soul, we must stand up and say—GOD WAS IN THE FIRE. The "still, small voice" could alone testify of him to the Hebrew prophet; but the higher faith of to-day hears him also in the wind, and feels him in the earthquake, and sees him in the fire. He is here and now—else never and nowhere. The flames that shot high into the skies above Chicago's blazing steeples, and ran like molten lightning over her new-paved streets, and roared like a tempest over her stately warehouses, her monstrous elevators, her happy homes, and wrapped in winding-sheets of fire the poor victims of such a conflagration as never before wrung the people's heart,—yes, God was there, or nowhere! All the pain and horror of that unutterable night were his doing; for his doing is Nature's doing, and Nature's doing is the enforcement of inexorable law. Prayers were powerless to stop the flames. But a bucketful of water at the start would have stopped them, and the reason why they were not stopped at the start was, not because God was cruel or Nature bloody-minded, but because—the bucketful of water was not there. If the fire had gone out without cause or reason, its extinguishment would have been a miracle—that is, the demonstration of atheism. Nothing but that—nothing but the overthrow of all cause and effect—can disprove the God whose law is the eternally unbroken law of Nature. But the exorable God—the God preached by the churches as a granter of prayers for rain—was, for thousands who know what prayers for rain went up that Sunday all over the land, burned up in the great Chicago fire. He was an idol, powerless to aid. Nature knows him not; and man will yet forget him.

But the God that is at once the law and the life of this vast universe speaks out of the billowy flames of the ruthless conflagration, with tones as audible as the "still, small voice" that in the legend made the Hebrew prophet veil his face in awe. He commands men to build their cities better, to invent mightier fire-engines, to put no kerosene lamps in stables within reach of cows' hoofs,—in a word, to trust to natural precautions and natural protections, to put no faith in idle prayers. He commands the rich, by a lesson so terrible that it cannot be forgotten, to make common cause with the poor, and to provide them better dwellings than piles of tinder ready to flash into flame at the falling of a spark. He commands rich and poor alike to see that they have but one common interest—that the woe of one is the woe of all—that the beggar and the millionaire are members of one family, each suffering with the other. He commands the prosperous to fly to the rescue of the homeless, the naked, the starving; and it is with pride and joy that we see now how well the world is obeying this command.

He who hears and heeds these divine tones will need no words of ours to show him that God was in the Fire.

FUNERAL.

In the funeral customs of our ancestors in England, the bier, we are told by Jeaffreson in his "Book about the Clergy," was sometimes "preceded by an open chariot which displayed to spectators the 'lively effigy,' a waxen image of the individual whose corporeal remains were being thus taken sumptuously to the tomb."

So I have beheld sects which, having cherished a creed while in its youth and vigor, have not been wise to part with it after it had died of old age, but have thenceforth gone perpetually in funeral procession, encumbered with the dead body, but following its waxen image in a chariot.

Lecky says in his "History of Rationalism:"—"We find the phraseology, the ceremonies, the formularies, the external aspect of some phase of belief that has long since perished, connected with a system that has been created by the wants and is thrilling with the life of modern civilization. They resemble those images of departed ancestors, which, it is said, the ancient Ethiopians were accustomed to paint upon their bodies, as if to preserve the pleasing illusion that those could not be really dead whose lineaments were still visible among them, and were still associated with life. But modern physiology has decided that such clogging of the pores of the skin with the painted images of the dead is hurtful to the health of the living."

John Stuart Mill hints, perhaps, at the real cause of this funeral habit of theology, when he says of the present age that it is one "which has been described as 'destitute of faith but terrified at scepticism'—in which people feel sure, not so much that their opinions are true, as that they should not know what to do without them."

RELIGION AND SOCIAL PROBLEMS.

Some remarks were made in these columns last week on the need of a more direct application of religion to the affairs of this world, if religion is to continue to hold its place as a sovereign power in human thought and conduct. That article closed with the statement that the religious sentiment and religious method, in order to meet the changes demanded of society, must be brought into harmonious relations with this fundamental principle,—that the world in both its physical and moral features is the subject of law, and that its law can be discovered by human intelligence and obeyed and co-operated with by the human will. Something, perhaps, may be advantageously added in regard to the practical workings of religion when it shall come to be organized on the basis of this principle.

Heretofore religion, especially in Christendom, has been organized on a basis of supernaturalism. The Divinity it has recognized has not been so much the inspiring and sustaining energy of law, as a power that over-rides and annuls law. It has looked for its divine revelation, not so much in the orderly processes of Nature and of human intelligence, as in those mysterious phenomena that seem now and then to have interrupted Nature's order and to have baffled human reason. Hence religion has become very generally connected with speculative and superstitious opinions and mystical ceremonies of worship. It has indulged in dreams and visions of future bliss, while it has neglected and despised the resources of the world that now is. It has regarded itself, indeed, as in natural conflict with this world, and has organized its forces with a view of conquering and destroying the power of "the world" rather than of reforming and elevating it.

But the practicability of any such process as this begins to be very apparent to the sagacious intellect of this age. There are signs that the leaders in religious organization, even in the limits of orthodoxy, are awaking to their mistake. The process will be slow, but the thorough awakening must come in time. There will be resistance; but the new principles and method, resting on the revelations of natural intelligence and law rather than on faith in supernatural intervention, must ultimately conquer. The monkish principle of seclusion, of separation from the stirring life of mankind, of setting religion in opposition to the world, has been proved a failure. It makes an artificial world, conjures up an artificial antagonism, and attempts to reconcile by an artificial theory what God has never put asunder. Instead of asking that her devotees may be taken out of the world as if they were too holy for its rough every-day work, religion will come to demand that they penetrate more and more into the world,—that they learn more of its secret ways and forces, discover more of its mysteries, discern its laws, ascertain its need, acquaint themselves with its resources,—and so be able to impart clearer knowledge of the divine intention as expressed in the practical working relations of matter and mind, and to inculcate a more rational and faithful obedience to divine law in all the offices of life. It is in this way that religion must to-day meet the great problems of social weal and woe which confront us, if she would successfully solve them. She must take and hold her natural place in the world by bringing to the world's evils a natural solution and remedy. She must be not merely a prophet, pointing forward to a land of promise (which has been too exclusively her attitude in the past), but a worker, girded for daily service, and making her prophecy sure by the solid practical rationality of her present labor.

And when religion shall come in this mien, the whole world, with all its departments, will be opened to her as her rightful domain. She will approach the manifold social problems of mankind, not as an intruder trying to impose some pet method of her own with which humanity has no natural affinity, not as a usurper bringing some foreign law to fasten as a yoke on the rebellious neck of the race, but as the discoverer and enforcer of the law which is native to humanity itself, and under which human beings, individually and collectively, may most effectively develop their own proper capacities for truth and virtue. Social science will then be seen to be no enemy to religion, but in friendly alliance with her; not a robber climbing up some other way to let her flock out of the old fold, but a timely handmaiden to help lead the flock into new pastures.

Under this head of social science, religion will recognize, not only the obligations, but the rights of the body. The natural laws of physical and mental health, to which moral health is closely allied, the scientific discoveries which show us how to care for our bodies and to regulate their various functions, the demand that our physical natures make for pure air and sunshine, for room and cleanliness and proper food and exercise—all these religion, rightly understood, will recognize and will re-enforce with a divine sanction. Acting on the principle that natural law is the expression of the divine intention and indicates the pathway of divine providence, she will apply herself especially to the prevention of many of the social evils that afflict mankind. She will strive to adjust the conflict between capital and labor by giving to each a fair share of the profits of their joint enterprise, so that each shall have the stimulus it needs for continued exertion, and the laborer as the capitalist all possible opportunity for culture and advancement. She will take marriage and lift it up from the low plane of mere social convenience, to which it is now too much degraded, out of the earth and mire of animal passion illegal or legalized, and make it one of her most helpful and holy sacraments. Impurity and licentiousness will flee from her approach, when she can reclaim as subject to divine law a province of human nature long abandoned to natural instinct alone. Temperance shall flow from her hands, when she shall lay them upon appetite with the claim that this too is a divine gift and under the restraint of serving some divine intention. Trade shall be purified from fraud, politics from corruption, material enterprises from their tendency to materialize character and life, when religion, instead of declaring war upon them, shall recognize them as her agents set to do her tasks in promoting human welfare. The home, freely open to her access, not as to an austere and solemn priest, but as if she were the most cheerful and welcome member of it, shall become her choicest sanctuary; and all human life, brought under her sway, shall become a sweet and fresh surprise of native virtue and gladness every day, because every day it will be felt to be a fresh inspiration of the primal Life of the universe, entering human faculty to make it a channel for the divine purpose and expressive of the divine thought and rectitude and love.

The New York Observer, one of the prominent evangelical journals of the country, had this paragraph a few weeks ago:—

"A man in Australia has set up to be the Messiah, and has easily found believers, especially among the women. He preaches polygamy, to which also the women consent. There is no delusion or imposture so base or absurd as not to find fools to believe in it."

If it takes a "fool" to believe in a living Messiah, what does it take to believe in a dead one? And which would the writer have been in the days of Jesus, an unbeliever or a "fool?"

The Observer teaches that what it is "folly" to believe to-day it was "faith" to believe eighteen hundred years ago. Can it wonder that some of its readers infer that "folly" and "faith" are identical terms?

THE MILAN RESOLUTIONS.

The Ohio State Association of Spiritualists, according to the Banner of Light, passed the following resolutions at their meeting at Milan, Sept. 3:—

Whereas, The Free Religionists in this country, eminent among whom are Abbot and Frothingham, hold views in common with Spiritualists on questions pertaining to natural progress, the intrinsic value of human nature, and the absolute liberty of the individual conscience in all matters of opinion and belief; and inasmuch as they recognize the necessity for a religion adapted to the needs of men and the present life, therefore,

Resolved, That we recognize the Free Religious Association as a wing in the great army of free thinkers, who, by their earnestness, culture, and vigorous thought, are destined to contribute much toward the religion of the future; and to them, we, as Spiritualists, extend our most cordial sympathy and hearty co-operation.

Resolved, That, encouraged by the many signs of progress in the past few years, we renew and emphasize our testimony and increase our work for all practical reforms helping to emancipate and ennoble humanity; and we gratefully accept the facts of spirit-presence and intercourse, giving broader and richer views of the life that is, and is to be forever, as helps and incentives to the wise conduct of life, and would urge the vital importance of freedom from authority, the fearless use of our own faculties, and allegiance to the truths of the soul as foundation work for the discovery and application of truth.

Resolved, That since the best social order and a true and lasting freedom are impossible without impartial justice, securing equal rights to all, and since it is true, not only in the Hebrew book of Genesis, but also in the nature of things, that "it is not good for man to be alone," but the mutual action and influence of both man and woman are needed for the best good of all, we favor and earnestly advocate suffrage for woman—plainly just, and therefore full of benefit as it is.

Resolved, That we urge such spiritual control over appetite and passion as shall lead to temperance in all of food or drink that may be of benefit; to abstinence from all that may be injurious; to rising above all degrading and filthy habits, such as the use of spirits and tobacco, to avoidance of all passionate excess, to that wise obedience of physical laws which will promote health, beauty, harmony and the power of long and useful accomplishment and enjoyment in this life.

Resolved, That we oppose all laws requiring Bible reading in schools, or the arbitrary observance of the Sabbath, as violations of individual conscience; and we also oppose all efforts to introduce religious dogmas or empty pious professions into State or National constitutions, as subversive of that liberty of conscience guaranteed by those constitutions, as pharisaical and dangerous."

For the fraternal spirit of these resolutions, we most cordially thank the Association; and in the main we highly approve them, as embodying principles that need very frequent and very emphatic enunciation.

But we want to say that the "Free Religionists" cannot be classified as a body or sect at all analogous to any existing bodies or sects. They deny (at least we deny) the possibility of running a dividing line anywhere between them and liberals in general. If Spiritualists believe in complete spiritual freedom and universal spiritual fellowship, they are as much entitled to be called "Free Religionists" as we are. The Free Religious Association have no special beliefs distinguishing them as a body from other bodies; as an organization, they acknowledge only a few general principles which they claim no property in, but recognize as the universal heritage of all liberal and earnest spirits. Their platform is all-comprehensive, excluding nothing but submission to Authority in Religion and Sect in Fellowship. The Spiritualists have a special belief in the idea of spirit-intercourse; the Materialists, in the idea that there is nothing but matter and the properties of matter; and so on. But these and other classes of liberals unite in asserting the right of free thought in religion and free fellowship among mankind the world over; and it is these large principles, which are infinitely broader than any special belief whatever, that constitute the essence of Free Religion.

We must, therefore, good-humoredly but very firmly declare that those who are called "Free Religionists" (we dislike the name greatly) because they have with one voice asserted freedom and fellowship in religion, cannot form a treaty of alliance with other liberals, not being in any sense a body of believers with a distinctive belief, except as opposed to those who base their own distinctive beliefs on authority or make them a test of fellowship. Spiritualists are as much "Free Religionists" as any other persons, if they avoid these vices of most historical religions. The Free Religious Association are only a little company of individuals, each with his own special beliefs, who have simply united to assert emphatically the superior importance of these general principles over all special beliefs whatever; and the whole value of their organization consists in the emphasis put on what concerns all mankind at large. They are not a separate "wing in the great army of free-thinkers;" but they come from centre and wings alike to carry forward the common banner which the entire army is marching after. They are often complained of because they steadfastly refuse as an organization to tack on to their few, great, simple principles a profession of faith in this or that special belief; and many Spiritualists have claimed to "go further" and to be "more radical," because they collectively do this. But we must insist that such a boast betrays great want of insight into the true nature of radicalism; and we have taken this opportunity to say so, because our Spiritualist friends so kindly and so heartily invite us now to work with them. We will work with them, and most gladly; but as liberals, not as Spiritualists. Their Spiritualism is their private and special belief, which we respect but do not share; and we are especially pleased by the above resolutions because, knowing that neither of the two "Free Religionists" they have named is a Spiritualist, these truly liberal Spiritualists nevertheless offer them so cordially the right hand of fellowship. With the foregoing frank explanation, we as cordially accept it; and we wish to be counted a friend by every one, Spiritualist or Materialist, Theist or Atheist, who loves liberty more than his ism and human fellowship more than sectarian walls.

We have read with surprise the article entitled "Free Logic and Free Religion," in the New York Independent for October 5. We shall make an early reply; but another subject has compelled our attention this week.

GENUINE FLESH AND BLOOD.—In the battle of Monmouth, where Major-General Lee, an officer who had resigned his commission in the British army and tendered his services to the Americans, had very nearly lost the day by ordering a retreat, it is related by Irving, that Washington "galloped forward to stop the retreat, his indignation kindling as he rode." The commander-in-chief soon encountered Lee approaching with the body of his command in full retreat. "By this time," says Irving, "he was thoroughly exasperated. 'What is the meaning of all this, sir?' demanded he, in the sternest and even fiercest tone, as Lee rode up to him. Lee, stung by the manner more than the words of the demand, made an angry reply, and provoked still sharper expressions, which have been variously reported." "The variously reported" expressions are the swearing, concerning the quality of which all the great historians, including Irving are silent. But the Marquis de Lafayette, when relating the circumstance to Governor Tompkins in 1842, declared that "this was the only time I ever heard General Washington swear. He called Lee a damned poltroon, and was in a towering rage." Another witness said Washington cried out to Lee, "In the devil's name, sir, go back to the front, or go to hell." And the late General Charles Scott, of Virginia, who had himself a most inveterate habit of swearing, being asked, after the revolutionary war, whether it was possible that the beloved and admired Washington ever swore, replied in his inimitable way, "Yes, sir, he did swear once. It was at Monmouth, and on a day that would have made any man swear. Yes, sir, he swore that day till the leaves shook on the trees, charming, delightful. Never have I enjoyed such swearing before or since. Sir, on that memorable day he swore like an angel from heaven!" —Ex.

THE CHRIST-PRINCIPLE.

WELLSVILLE, KAN., Oct 5, 1871.

EDITOR INDEX:—I am a Free Religionist; I am also a Christian. I could not be a Christian without being a Free Religionist. I have carefully read your "Truths for the Times." In spirit, Free Religion and true Christianity cannot and do not differ.

You will allow me to define Christianity. It is the following of Christ,—not worshipping Christ as a person, but as a principle.

I must say that so far as I am capable of judging Free Religion, it acknowledges the principle.

There is a vast deal of superstition covered up by professed Christianity; but, I ask, is this sufficient reason for discarding the genuine?

Christianity is not a set of doctrines, but the practice of truth and goodness.

I hold that a true Christian cannot worship the person of Jesus, for that is idolatry.

Christ did not teach such superstitious dogmas as vicarious atonement, eternal punishment, or his own Deity.

I do not accept the Bible as an inspired production of godly men; but why, Mr. Abbot, in your criticisms on the Bible, do you not notice the beauties, the grand truths expressed by it? You do not seem to appreciate the glorious truths contained in that "Old Book," or, as A. J. Davis calls it, "Excellent Soft Bark."

The same charges that you make against Christianity may be made against Spiritualism or Free Religion.

However, go on. Opposition and truthful criticism cannot hurt the truth.

PHI PL.

[Our correspondent must have read THE INDEX a little carelessly, if he thinks we have not recognized the good as well as the evil in the Bible.

The "Christ-principle" is the Divinely ordained Lordship of Jesus. We see no other principle which the word "Christ" can properly represent. But as this principle is in our opinion a false one, we cannot regard Christianity, or the "worship of Christ as a principle," as by any means identical with the "practice of truth and goodness." The principles of Free Religion are utterly incompatible with any one's "Lordship." They cannot be attached to any one's personality, but are as impersonal as the laws of mathematics or political economy. Free Religion and Christianity, therefore, cannot be identical.—Ed.]

THE NEW TESTAMENT JESUS.

EDITOR INDEX:—I have been much interested in reading the comments and criticisms attendant upon Mr. Towne's estimates of Jesus, and my interest in the subject has led me to a more careful study of the only real "Life of Christ" we have, namely, the New Testament. After deliberate and unprejudiced study, I find that I can neither agree with one side nor the other. So far as the human side of Jesus' life, as narrated by the apostles, goes, I find him a pure, elevated character; but here we read of his being taken to the top of a mountain by the Devil, whence he could see the whole earth! Here is unenlightened ignorance, showing that the "inspired" writer did not know that the world was a sphere; also, that he believed in a personal Satan, with power enough to carry Christ off to a mountain peak and tempt him. Again, he changes water miraculously into wine: a lie! How can we know, then, that the Sermon on the Mount was not just as much an invention by the writer? He raised people from the dead: another mistake. Do you say the Temptation of the Devil was an allegory, the miracles the delusions of the scribes who handed down Jesus' name? Then they have not reported his cause aright. Is that your conclusion?

Well, the four apostles all report him as saying that he was the "Son of God," and "one with the Father," and so forth, come to "save the world," and "whosoever believeth in me," and so forth, and so forth. Evidently this part of the Bible is true history, if any of it is, and it makes out plainly to me that Jesus thought himself the Messiah; therefore I say with Mr. Towne that he was a "fanatic," mad or not. If the New Testament is bona fide history, and if some parts of it are allegory, some ignorant mistakes, and the rest of it relics of ancient and barbarous superstition, I want to know how you are going to strip the hero of all this ugly Messiahship and Christianity, and make him out the "best man that ever lived" or even "one of the best" by the side of the thousands of noble souls of modern times?

And the result of it all is that I shall give up reading and "studying" the Bible, for I don't care a fig what it is or isn't. I have good books enough that I can read, and that make me holier for the reading. There is not enough sound morality in either the Old or New Testaments to make up for the mysticisms therein contained. Mr. Abbot, hoist PRINCIPLES on the banner of Free Religion, and let Jesus or any other man stand on his own merits.

I am yours,

W. H. D.

[Believing that Jesus was one of the many great souls of history whose greatness was alloyed by the superstitious errors of their times, we see no reason why the modern world should rotate around him as an axis. We pay him the tribute of a sincere admiration, and pass on to the work of to-day. Christianity had its historical origin in his career; but now it is the great system of belief and practice embodied in the Christian Church, the soul of which is submission to authority. It is no longer a religion to inspire the world's march towards perfection. Our friend is right—the banner of Free Religion must have nothing but Principles inscribed upon its folds.—Ed.]

JACOLLIOT'S "BIBLE IN INDIA."

SAG HARBOR, N. Y., Oct. 3, 1871.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT:—

I have received and distributed six copies of Voysey's "Lecture on the Bible." The strongest arguments against the idea of the Bible being the word of God appear to me to come from Comparative Theology. I suppose you have read the "Bible in India," by Jacolliot. Who is he? Strauss we know, and Renan we know; but this man nobody seems to know. He writes a book, and vanishes. I compiled and published in the Sag Harbor Corrector, some time ago, an account of the Creation of Man, taken, he says, from the Vedas. I also published, under the head of "Gems of Wisdom," some extracts or verses from the "Bhagavat-Geeta," but I have since procured that book, and there is nothing of the kind in it. If it can be proved that the Bible was copied in part from the Sacred Books of India, as I believe it was, that settles the question as to its being divinely inspired.

Yours truly,

P. ROOSEVELT JOHNSON.

[The "Bible in India" is another work of the same worthless character as Robert Taylor's "Diegesis." Here is an extract from Prof. Max Mueller's First Lecture on the Science of Religion, originally published in Fraser's Magazine, and reprinted in this country in Littell's Living Age for Aug. 6, 1870:—

"I may add that a book which has lately attracted considerable attention, La Bible dans l'Inde, by M. Jacolliot, belongs to the same class of books. Though the passages from the sacred books of the Brahmins are not given in the original, but only in a very poetical French translation, no Sanskrit scholar would hesitate for one moment to say that they are forgeries, and that M. Jacolliot, the President of the Court of Justice at Chandernagore, has been deceived by his native teacher. . . . M. Jacolliot's conclusions and theories are such as might be expected from his materials."—Ed.]

OBSERVATIONS ABROAD.

ATLANTIC OCEAN, July 27, 1871,
(while returning from Europe).

EDITOR INDEX:—Although it was my intention to send you send you some little communication ere this, the sight-seeing, and so forth, has monopolized my time almost exclusively, so that now, not with the freshness of the first impressions and the inspiration of the moment, but after calm consideration of the subjects, I shall endeavor to lay my observations before you.

Here in Europe as with us—on the ocean as well as in the domestic circles of city and country—I found the question of religion the leading one.

I was astonished in some places to witness by eye and ear the gorgeous pageantry of ritualism, to see monks in coarse woollen gowns with a rope around their body fully strong enough either to lash the lazy, fat fellows into honest work or to hang them by, rosary and crucifix dangling by their sides, and artificial moonshine upon their heads. Fat, young, good-looking as they were, I am still in doubt whether their devotions, while handling their rosary, were not disproportionately divided between their ostensible prayers and the pretty young women who were curiously regarding them. I often saw priests with their back to the audience mumbling something, picking up bits of paper, ringing little bells, bowing lady-like and making the sign of the cross, while one or two boys, in like array, were kneeling right or left. As I witnessed this performance once for a full hour, and as my patience gave out before the service did, I know that the truly Christian virtue of patience was not mine so fully as theirs.

I rode in omnibus and on railroad, by steamer and sail-boat, with priests bent on services of love, going to the hospitals where the wounded and sick lay, or to the private sick chamber. I sought conversation with them, and found them conservative and contracted in their views, and perfectly horror-struck when, as in a few instances I gave them the opportunity to do, they found I was not one of them.

While I would not deny them in some instances earnestness and absolute faith in their doctrines, I could not help at the same time admiring their simplicity—such as Huss at the stake had occasion to admire, when peasants and women helped carry fuel for his destruction. In Westminster Abbey and St. Paul's at London, at the treasury of the Dome at Cologne, Mayence, Aix la Chapelle, and various other places, the actions of the reverend fathers, who showed for money (much money in some instances) the holy relics of their shrines, were to say the least unbecoming, and befitted better the occupation of a juggler than the calling of a servant of the religion of love.

I looked around among the audience assembled for service in many of the Catholic churches, perhaps more in France than in other places, and found more women than had passed the meridian of life and exhibited the signs of many storms and little prosperity, than men. As I went generally in the day time, I thought to improve my observations by going in the evening, but found the audience about the same, only looking more sombre and more like "miserable sinners"—a phrase in some places so often repeated by them, that I finally believed them really to be such. Going to a Tivoli or Summer-garden or Cafe, after witnessing these so-called Christian meetings, I was forcibly struck with the multitude of happy faces, young and old, male and female, who in the luxury of fragrant flowers, the cool night-air, the splendor of the many-colored lamps, with fountains, grottoes, strains of music filling the air, manifested only joy and exuberance of vitality. Involuntarily I thought that the religion, or the service, if you will, was more to blame than the people, or that their time had not yet come.

Our steamer, the Westphalia, one of the largest vessels of the New York and Hamburg Line, is filled to its utmost capacity with passengers, there being 516 steerage, 125 second and 70 first cabin passengers, besides 150 officers, seamen, waiters, and so forth, on board. There is, consequently, on the one common deck, wide and long as it is, but little space for walking and sporting left, especially when, as on this moon-light night, everybody seems to be on deck.

Following the strains of what appeared to be the sweetest music, I found a group of nuns, thirteen in number, chanting the beautiful song, "Silent night, blessed night," well known to your readers, I think. Their well-trained voices were half hushed by their clustering close together, some of them sitting, others in a reclining position. I found the latter not only the owners of the finest voices, but also of the most attractive features. The older ones—it may be understood that "youthful" is the epithet by which the central, half-hidden singers might be characterized—formed a protecting wall in standing position around the others. Quite a respectable number of hearers gathered around the singers, and song after song, Latin and German, some of them strictly ritualistic, others more generally known, rang out on the quiet and serene night. The hilarity, the ringing though subdued laughter of the pretty centre, not rarely caused an admonitory rap to reach the hood-covered head of the but half-finished nun; while on several occasions the well-rounded, white arm of the same party, when unduly emerging from its sombre-colored sleeve, found itself quickly re-adjusted by the matron nearest. At another time a slight touch from an elderly sister sufficed to cause the enthusiastic silver notes, reaching a high cadence which swelled to its natural fulness, to drop mournfully to the subdued tone of the rest.

A pause occurred, and one of my newly made friends, discovering me in the crowd of hearers, got hold of my arm, and with the remark—"We are having a glorious time,"—led me along. I found a dense crowd near the centre of our deck, where a dusky sailor was grinding away in a vigorous style at a huge square box, resembling more an ancient sarcophagus than what they called it, a—hand-organ! Yes, such it had been, and, like the fiddler's one-stringed instrument in the wolves' trap-hole, proved efficient to lure those beasts into musical revelry. This antiquated, squealing relic of a huge hand-organ made our steerage passengers hop around in a frantic way. Some had undoubtedly given special study to the French "Can-can," while modest country lasses, half carried in the arms of their sturdy lads, contrasted not a little with the wild, fantastic, if not indecent, movements of the former. I thought I had seen enough and heard more than enough, so I turned away for a walk towards the bow, where sailors and steerage passengers, squatting promiscuously on the deck, were accompanying the chords of a well-played accordion with their lusty, though coarse, voices. Bottles freely circulating seemed to have an exhilarating influence upon the singers; and when the "Wacht am Rhein" was struck up, the enthusiasm and vigor of the singers reached the culmination point. Good night this time. K.

Among the items which are going the rounds of the papers, is one about "an Illinois man who preaches Sundays and drives a stage on week-days." We once heard a capital lay sermon on a week-day, from the box of a stage-coach. Several clergymen were anxious to reach a certain church in time to hear a famous preacher. When ten miles away, they offered money to the driver if he would go a little faster, although he was then proceeding at a reasonable rate of speed. He spurned the bribe, saying, "For my wages, I drive these horses as fast as is good for them, and you have not got dimes enough to make me drive them any faster."—Christian Register.

Good and bad men are each less so than they seem.—Coleridge.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

INDEX TRACTS

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION have published the following tracts, and will publish others of a similar character, if encouraged to do so by the receipt of enough orders to cover the expense:—

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no abler, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Fifteen copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. It gives reliable statistics showing that, at the lowest estimate, this system would take about Forty Thousand Years to convert the world; and quotes the highest authorities proving the utter failure of the Catholics to civilize the Paraguay Indians, and of the Protestants to civilize the Sandwich Islanders, in any true sense of the word. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Fifteen copies One Dollar.

Also, the scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition by PARKER PILLSBURY, entitled "The Sunday Question," is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

Friends of Free Religion wishing to assist the publication of such tracts as these will please donate such sums as they think proper, which will be applied exclusively to this purpose. Address—

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is TWO DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Circulars with list of subjects will be sent on application.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

"GOD IN THE CONSTITUTION:"

WOULD IT BE RIGHT TO INCORPORATE RELIGIOUS DOGMAS INTO THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES?

BY REV. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD.

Some time ago a Convention assembled in the city of Alleghany for the purpose of effecting a change in the Constitution of the United States, with the view of making the instrument, and the people under it, "Christian" in character. Soon after another Convention met in Philadelphia for the same object. After much discussion the following memorial to Congress was adopted and circulated among the people for their signatures:

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress Assembled:

We, citizens of the United States, respectfully ask your honorable bodies to adopt measures for amending the Constitution of the United States so as to read, in substance, as follows:

"We, the people of the United States, humbly acknowledging Almighty God as the source of all authority and power in civil Government, the Lord Jesus Christ as the Ruler among the Nations, and his revealed will as of supreme authority, in order to constitute a Christian Government, and in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the inalienable rights and blessings of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness to ourselves, our posterity, and all the inhabitants of the land, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

And we further ask that such changes be introduced into the body of the Constitution as may be necessary to give effect to these amendments in the preamble.

Subsequently to this a "National Association" was formed, and a monthly paper established in Philadelphia to secure the changes contemplated. When such a man as Judge Strong, of the Supreme Court of the United States, can accept the post of President, and such a man as General Howard, of the Army, can accept the Vice Presidency of such a society, it is time that the people who are to be affected by the desired changes, should examine the subject.

The opinions and wishes expressed in the above memorial are confined chiefly to the class of Presbyterians whose seat of influence is in Western Pennsylvania. This section of country, having been settled originally by Irish and Scotch-Irish people, is the home and stronghold of the Presbyterian element in the American church. We have Reformed Presbyterians or Old Side Covenanters, Reformed Presbyterians or New Side Covenanters, Associate Presbyterians, Associate Reformed Presbyterians, United Presbyterians, Old School Presbyterians and New School Presbyterians united. The oldest of these sects is the first named, being the descendants and representatives of the men who, at the Revolution Settlement in 1690, refused to acknowledge William and Mary as King and Queen of Great Britain, because they declined to subscribe the "Solemn League and Covenant," as their predecessors had done. They held verbatim to the Westminster Confession of Faith, and retain in their creed the following article on the powers and duties of the civil magistrate:

CHAPTER XXXIII, SEC. 3. "The civil magistrate may not assume to himself the administration of the word and sacraments or the power of the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven; yet hath he authority, and it is his duty to take order that unity and peace be preserved in the church, that the truth of God be kept pure and entire, that all blasphemies and heresies be suppressed, all corruptions and abuses in worship and discipline prevented or reformed, and all the ordinances of God duly settled, administered and observed, and for the better effecting whereof he hath power to call Synods, to be present at them, and to provide that whatsoever is transacted in them be according to the mind of God."

Most, if not all the other sects of the Presbyterian family in the United States, have repudiated the doctrine of this article; and, adopting sentiments diametrically opposite, have either expunged it from their creeds altogether, or explained it away by foot-notes. Yet such is the veneration cherished by all Presbyterians for the wisdom and godliness of the Westminster Assembly that to these views of the power of the Civil Magistrate must be traced the present movement for altering the Constitution of the United States by inserting in the preamble a series of theological doctrines. All intelligent lovers of human liberty are free to acknowledge the obligations of the world to the Scotch Presbyterians for the long and arduous service they rendered the sacred cause in their native land. They preserved the Ark of Freedom when it would have been dashed to pieces forever by the crown and the nobility. But they were tainted with the spirit of religious intolerance in common with all their contemporaries, as is evident from the article of their confession just quoted.

Philip II, of Spain, never claimed more for himself as Civil Magistrate than this article claims. When he waded knee-deep in the blood of the Netherlands, he was thoroughly sincere and conscientious. In slaughtering by fire and sword fifty thousand human beings of both sexes he was only "taking order that unity and peace be preserved in the church, and blasphemies and heresies," as he understood them to be, "were suppressed." He and his red handed colleagues, the ecclesiastics, declared that they knew "the mind of God," and that they were acting in accordance therewith.

In regard to this reverence for the authority of our ancestors, I wish to say that, as the world is older now than it was then, we are the ancients, and the Westminster Assembly, their contemporaries and predecessors, were the moderns. We understand the genius of Christianity, its doctrines and its requirements, far better than those who lived in the first century of the Christian Era, or any other intervening century between that and this. If this is doubted, I ask whether it would be possible to engraft the puerilities and credulities of the Patristic ages upon the faith of this generation? The subject of human rights, and the province of human government are better understood now than they ever were since the creation. This veneration, therefore, for errors, because they were held in the infancy of civilization by men who, although good and sincere and great for their times, were comparatively babes in all kinds of knowledge, is highly discreditable to us who have all the attainments of the past ages with those of the present superadded. We might as well hold to the Ptolemaic system of astronomy, which represented the earth to be flat and the sun to revolve round it, because our ancestors believed that theory. We might as well believe in witchcraft because so good a man as John Wesley, only a hundred years ago, declared that to give up belief in witchcraft was the same as to give up the Bible.

II. The second dogma which these "Reformers" wish the Constitution to affirm, is that "the Lord Jesus Christ is the ruler among the Nations." This language is meant to express the doctrine of the Divinity of Jesus Christ as Mediator between God and Man.

Now there are three classes of our citizens, composing an overwhelming majority of the whole, whose opinions would be subjected to constitutional censure by such a provision as this.

There are the Israelites, who, for the first time in eighteen hundred years, have found in the United States a resting place for the soles of their wandering feet. You charge the Hebrew with a want of patriotism, and say his wishes ought not to be consulted in the matter in hand. Have you forgotten that during the long and wearisome centuries of his persecution—a persecution which knew no mercy and no abatement—he had no country to love; that he was banished from every land under heaven, and oppressed as no people on earth has ever been? Where was there in all the world a more patriotic people than the Jews, when Palestine was their country and Jerusalem their glorious capital? At Babylon did they not weep and hang their harps upon the willows, when they remembered the land of their birth? You charge the Jew with being selfish and unscrupulous in his methods of making money. In many cases this is true; but have you forgotten that these features of character were ground into him by the ceaseless impositions and robberies committed upon him by every government of the Old World for more than fifty-four generations? These were not the characteristics of the Jews in the days of the Hebrew Commonwealth. Then they illustrated all that was noble and magnanimous in man, and all that was refined and gentle in woman. These attributes are superinduced upon the character of a people by oppression; and it is creditable to our common nature, when we consider how for eighteen centuries the Jew has been treated as the offscouring of all things, that he is no worse than he is. Under the genial influence of our American institutions, all these faults you criticize in the Hebrew character gradually disappear, just as the "blarney" of the Irish, and the imputed deceitfulness of the Scotch character, generated by centuries of civil and political disability in their native countries, give way in the first generation after they become American citizens. I am proud to allude to the fact, and I deem it a pledge and a guarantee of the present and future protection of heaven to the government and people of the United States, that no son of Abraham, "the friend of God," has ever been persecuted in this country—that while every where else on earth, and by every other government, he has been treated as a brute and a devil, under the outstretched wings of the American Eagle he stands, not only civilly, but politically and religiously free, and the equal before the law of every other citizen. The Constitution now, in order to throw the shield of its protection over him, only inquires whether he is a man. But if "amended" in the way contemplated, it would be compelled to inquire into his theology. For long ages the so-called Christian governments of Europe have tried by fire, by banishment, and by every other means of cruelty, to make him believe in the Messiahship of Jesus Christ, but all in vain. Shall we treat his religious opinions with contempt as a nation, by virtually making the constitution declare him a heretic?

Then there are the Unitarians, who would be disfranchised by the adoption of the proposition we are considering. Many of the most refined, intelligent, virtuous, and benevolent people in this country belong to this class of religionists. As we, Presbyterians, cannot, with the evidence now before our minds, receive the doctrine of the Unitarians, so they, with existing evidence before their minds, cannot receive our doctrine. Belief is not a matter of choice, as seems to be taken for granted by all those who propose to legislate men into the belief of a given creed by pains and penalties, but it is a matter of evidence. A man is not responsible for his honest belief, whatever it may be. He must believe according to the evidence before his mind, and can do no otherwise. But he is responsible for an earnest examination of all the grounds of belief or disbelief of any important propositions in religion. Men's opinions are generally a matter of hereditary descent; but beliefs—convictions—are the result of a sincere investigation of both sides of a question. But the misfortune, for which there is no remedy at present, is that equally honest men, viewing a proposition in religion from different stand-points, and through the jaundiced medium of prejudice, differ fundamentally from each other, and that unavoidably. And as no man knows, whatever he may think, that he is right and all the rest are wrong, respect for the opinions of others is as much a duty as respect for his own.

Now what havoc would be made of the political status of the Unitarians, the Universalists, the Disciples and other classes whom the orthodox call errorists and heretics, if the so-called Reformers could succeed in putting this dogma of the divinity of Christ into the Constitution, and securing such legislation by Congress "as will give effect" to it? The whole of the New England delegation at Washington, with the exception of Henry Wilson, and probably one or two more, would be disfranchised and sent home to civil life. Even Charles Sumner, to whom this nation owes a debt it can never pay, must give up his place in the Senate and seek the shades of private life! This proposal is so stupid, and abhorrent to one's sense of decency and justice, that the "Reformers," in one or two instances, have denied it to be part of their plan. But look at the facts of the case.

No member of Congress or of a State Legislature can take his seat, no attorney at law can practise in our courts of justice, no man can hold office at all, unless he swears to support the Constitution of the United States. If, then, the Constitution contained this religious article, not standing as a dead letter, but as an essential part of the organic law to be carried out as the memorialists ask, neither the Jew nor the Unitarian could hold office without perjury. For they do not believe, and therefore cannot support, the article of faith embodied in the Constitution, declaring the divinity of Jesus Christ.

3. Then there are at least twenty millions out of our thirty-eight millions of people who are not professors of religion at all, some of whom have no clearly defined opinions on religious subjects, and many of whom may be unbelievers in the Bible, but who are all nevertheless men, and as such entitled to their rights as we are. Will it make this large class "Christian" in the sense of the Alleghany Convention, by simply putting the doctrine in question into the Constitution? And if only a few millions of our population really hold the doctrine as an article of faith, while twenty millions do not hold it, would not the insertion of the doctrine into the Constitution, which purports to express as a test and qualification for office the opinions of the whole people, make us a nation either of ignoramuses or hypocrites? And can the Omniscient God who trieth the hearts of the children of men be pleased with so empty a procedure as this would be? It would be re-enacting the folly of the Scotch Presbyterians, who, although they had the best evidence that the two Stuart Kings were perjured traitors to the Solemn League and Covenant, yet seemed satisfied when they went through the solemn mockery of subscribing the bond. As if there were the least virtue in a mere profession!

The province of civil government, as an ordinance of God, is just as distinct, peculiar and exclusive, as that of a railroad company, an insurance company, or a bank. Its purpose is confined solely to the concerns of this world, which, in their place, are just as important to our well-being here and hereafter as the things we denominate religious. It is a means to an end. The end of government is the protection of every human being in his person and property. The civil magistrate, therefore, is a minister of God to see to this very thing, and nothing else. The moment he transcends his functions and undertakes to meddle with the religious opinions of the people, he ceases to be the minister of God for good, and becomes the servant of the devil for harm. Why, then, put into a constitution of civil government theological doctrines which no one would dream of inserting into the organic law of a railroad company or a bank? Is not God honored infinitely more by the Government, when it attends religiously to its own specific business of protecting the persons and property of man, than when it impudently, stupidly, and unlawfully intermeddles with those matters with which, in the nature of the case, it has nothing in the world to do? When shall we learn that God alone is Lord of the conscience, and that the moral machinery of the soul by which a human being works out his own religious convictions is beyond the reach of all legislation, either by the Church or the State? God made the intellect to be free and to hold intimate communion with Him on the high places of the truth. But kings and priests have evermore attempted to enslave it, and they sanction and sanctify their high-handed interference by proclaiming that they do it "by the grace of God," and for the good of the Church.

III. But the memorialists demand that the Constitution of the United States shall declare "the revealed will of God to be the supreme will of the land." Now what an apple of discord, what a Pandora's box, this proposition, if adopted, would be! What is the "revealed will of God?" Is it the Old Testament, including the law of Moses, as the Jews allege? Is it the Old Testament and the New combined, as the Christians claim? Is it the Bible, interpreted by the Councils of the Church, and including the Apocryphal Books, as the Catholics contend? Is it the Bible, interpreted by private judgment, and excluding the Apocryphal writings, as the Protestants declare? Is it the moral law called the Decalogue, requiring among other things the observance of the seventh day as the Sabbath, in which no manner of work shall be done by either man or beast upon pain of death, as one class of Baptists maintain? Is it the Moral Law, with the Sabbath of the fourth commandment altered from the seventh to the first day of the week, with a modification of the stringency of the rule in cases of necessity and mercy, as held by the members of the Alleghany and Philadelphia Conventions? Each one of the innumerable sects of Christendom, from the mere fact that it is a sect, claims that it has the authority of "the revealed will of God" for its existence, its dogmas, and its other peculiarities, as against all the rest. And under the "amended" Constitution each would set forth its superior and unquestionable claim with tremendous zeal. In the midst of this jargon, who shall decide what is "the revealed will of God?" The very umpire himself, before he takes his seat, must belong to some sect. Will all the rest agree that his definition of the terms shall be deemed final?

IV. But the "Reformers" "further ask that such changes be introduced into the body of the Constitution as may be necessary to give effect to these amendments in the preamble." This means that there shall be a Constitutional requisition on the co-ordinate branches of the government to carry out these provisions and require the citizens by law to profess and act in accordance therewith. In short, it means an established church which shall co-operate with the civil magistrate in carrying out the purposes announced in the Preamble. I know that this idea was disclaimed by one or more of the Philadelphia Convention. But if the Convention really desired to organize a Court of High Commission after the Scotch model, for the purpose of bringing before that tribunal all those who repudiate the doctrines of the preamble, and violate the "revealed will of God" as the Court understood it, they could not use more precise and definite language than they have used to express the idea. Ask an honest and intelligent old Covenanter, who sincerely adopts the Article of the Westminster Confession on the powers of the civil magistrate which I have quoted, what he means by the language of the memorial, and he will frankly tell you that it means legislative enforcement of the doctrines of the Preamble. For he knows that it would be superlative folly and emptiness to parade a set of religious dogmas in the Constitution without enforcing the belief and practice of them by law. He will tell you that God is not Baal that he can be deceived and hoodwinked by "We the People," declaring in the preamble of the Constitution that we believe and practise such and such doctrines and duties, while, at least, nineteen-twentieths of the whole population believe and practise no such thing. The preamble of the Constitution sets forth the establishment of justice as one of the grand purposes of the instrument. And, therefore, in the body of the Constitution we have articles and sections organizing a Supreme Court. For carrying out the other great objects, we have the Executive and Legislative Departments of the Government. But here are three most important religious dogmas in the preamble, so important that their adoption is deemed necessary to make us a Christian Government; and lest they stand there a mere brutum fulmen, like the Pope's bull against the comet, the memorialists ask that such changes may be made in the body of the Constitution, as will give effect to these amendments of the preamble. What does this mean—that can it mean but an organization, a fourth department of the Government, whose function, as it is in European Governments, is to give order concerning the worship of God, and to see to it that all the citizens believe the established articles of faith, and square their conduct by the revealed will of God, which is the supreme law of the land, and of the prohibitions and requirements of which that department is to be the judge?

Suppose now the people of the United States were guilty of the stupendous folly of voting themselves heretics, and putting their religious opinions, or non-opinions, under the ban of the Constitution, as would result from these proposed amendments, the next step in the programme might be, as one sect after another found itself in the numerical majority, the introduction into Congress of a bill declaring that—"Whereas baptism by immersion, or baptism by sprinkling, or Episcopacy, or Presbyterianism, or Congregationalism, or a thousand other things in belief or practice, is, or is not, contrary to the 'revealed will of God,' which is the supreme law of the land, and contrary also to the other Articles of Faith in the Preamble of the Constitution, therefore, be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives," &c. And then for the thumb-screws and the iron boot! Then for Laud, and the inevitable Court of High Commission, and the Court of Star Chamber, a recurrence of those scenes of blood, the history of which, one would suppose, would lead the descendants of the Scotch Presbyterians in the United States to thank God every day of their lives that by our glorious and most Christian Constitution they are in no danger of the Sharpes and Lauders of those who martyred their sainted fathers by the thousand. The waves of religious persecution ebb as well as flow, in the just retributions of Heaven, for such folly and wickedness. And although under our "amended" Constitution, the Jews, the Unitarians and the Infidels would be the first to suffer, the next class to drink the bitter cup might be the very men who are so zealous now in seeking to make the contemplated change. In Scotland the Catholics, having at first the power, persecuted the Protestants in common. The Prelatists mounted the next wave, and overwhelmed the unhappy Presbyterians. Then the Presbyterians in their turn came into power, and wreaked their vengeance on the Prelatists. Then the tide turned under James II, and the Presbyterians had again to bite the dust. Thus it was in England and all over Europe, till the earth was fattened with the blood its inhabitants shed in the unholy cause of religious persecution. So it would be in this country. Even in this enlightened age there is no man, no set of men, and no church, great or small, that can be trusted with absolute dominion over the human conscience for a single hour. In the minority and powerless, the ecclesiastical or sectarian passion is as amiable and harmless as an unweaned cub. But invest it with power, and it becomes as ferocious and blood-thirsty as a Bengal tiger. Such is human nature in all ages and countries when diabolized by the sectarian spirit. This spirit is just as rampant and cruel in the United States as it ever was in the Old World. It attempts to read all history with its eyes shut. It keeps its face eternally towards the Past instead of the Future, and its unquenchable desire is to be both Pope and King. If history teaches us anything clearly, it teaches us this lesson. And now that the American people, by the mercy of God, have this foul fiend constitutionally chained and under their feet, let them keep it there.

These men who want to remodel the Constitution are in dead earnest. They feel that loyalty to Jesus Christ as King of Nations requires them at least to make the effort. One of them, the Rev. Dr. Sproull of Alleghany, in an article published in the Christian Statesman for January 15th, 1868, while commenting on that clause of the Constitution, Article 6, Section 3—"No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification for any office or public trust,"—uses the following language: "The question demanding consideration is, should those parts of the Constitution be so amended as to secure the appointment of religious men to office, and give the Christian Church the benefit of National support? We take the affirmative, and will in this paper sustain our position. . . . We do not wish an amendment to come as a kind of patch-work—a piece of new cloth on an old garment. We want the whole made new; the government to be put squarely under Christ, and none but Christ's friends to be suffered to meddle with its administration. . . . The clause in question should be expunged, and a declaration inserted in its place, that civil office be restricted to God-fearing or religious men."

This is explicit, this is honest—too honest; for such was the alarm produced by the language quoted, that the Christian Statesman choked off the old Cameronian so that he has never given us, as he promised, the rest of his views. But we all know whom Dr. Sproull means by "Christ's friends"—"God-fearing, religious men." They are such as he allows to come to the communion table of the Covenant Church. If, by an unprecedented stretch of charity, others are included in these phrases at all, they are regarded as merchants regard their damaged goods; or as English Rail Roads regard second and third-class passengers. They are not worthy of being considered the particular, reliable friends of Christ—first-class Christians, travelling to the land of Canaan in first-class cars with first-class accommodations, but as mere hangers-on to the trains—outside of the "uncovenanted mercies of God."

But—

"There is some soul of goodness in things evil, Would men observingly distil it out;"

and this galvanic movement of the bloody and dead Past to throw its dark shadow over the bright path of the Future will only have the effect to lead Americans to study the subject of government more profoundly than ever, and to build up around the rights of the human conscience bulwarks of granite to protect them against the heaven-daring assaults of the theological spirit, which the history of the Church for 1800 years shows to be both unscrupulous in its means, and relentless in its aim.

FREE LOGIC AND FREE RELIGION!

[From the New York Independent of Oct. 5, 1871.]

Several weeks since, we noticed a charge made in THE INDEX, of Toledo, the Free Religious organ of Mr. F. E. Abbot, to the effect that "it takes three dollars to send one to the heathen." This statement we characterized at the time as untrue and injurious. After considerable delay, Mr. Abbot recently returned to the discussion with the following deliberate justification of his original slander:

"According to Dr. Mullen, over five millions of dollars are annually expended in sustaining foreign missions. What is the annual total of 'conversions' effected? And what proportion of this vast sum is expended directly on the 'heathen'? We believe that fully 'seventy-five per cent.' of these five millions is absorbed in salaries and running expenses of various kinds, and that a sum falling far short of the residual twenty-five per cent. remains to benefit those for whom the whole is ostensibly raised."

It will be seen that this is a skilful attempt to change the issue. Mr. Abbot quoted as a "common saying" the statement that it takes three dollars to send one to the heathen. This saying has been "common" only among persons who are in the habit of bearing false witness against Christianity and its professors; and in their mouths it has meant simply that three quarters of the money collected for missionary purposes was expended in this country in the payment of the running expenses of the missionary boards, including rents, publications, salaries of secretaries, agents, and the like. When Mr. Abbot quoted this "common saying," it was natural to suppose that he quoted it with the meaning commonly attached to it. But in the words cited above he includes "salaries" among the other running expenses, leaving it to be inferred that he intended, in his original statement, to reckon the salaries of the missionaries into the "seventy-five per cent." Now, if Mr. Abbot did not mean to include the salaries of the missionaries, his accusation is false and slanderous, as we have said. If he did mean to include them, it is silly and meaningless. Not three-quarters of the money contributed for missions, but the whole of it, is expended for running expenses and salaries of missionaries. The missionary societies are not eleemosynary institutions, as Mr. Abbot very well knows. It is not to carry money or material charities to the heathen that they are organized. Their whole work is to sustain preachers and teachers in heathen lands. All the money they collect that is not needed to pay the expenses of collection and superintendence is devoted to this purpose. And when Mr. Abbot says he meant that three-quarters of the money raised by these societies was absorbed in these two ways—namely, in defraying the expenses of collection and superintendence, and in paying the salaries of the missionaries—he is guilty of prevarication. What does he suppose is done with the other quarter?

We are not alone in our judgment of Mr. Abbot's style of argument. Perceiving that he had involved himself in some difficulties by his crooked methods of dealing with the subject, he undertook in a lecture on "Christian Propagandism," read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, on the 16th of last month, to straighten out his logic. In his lecture he quotes from letters addressed to him, as he says, by some of his best friends, pointing out to him the unfairness and incoherence of his reasoning. One of these friends tells him in so many words that in his reply to The Independent he "shifted his ground a bit," and says:

"Moreover, on the first ground I don't think you quite hold your own, for 'payment of salaries' includes salaries of missionaries themselves, which were legitimately the main object of the appropriation; as much as for an anti-slavery society to pay the salaries of its agents."

To this Mr. Abbot replies that he is not conscious of having shifted his ground; that he did intend "to include the salaries of the missionaries, which are the chief part of the machinery." And he proceeds to argue that we can only judge whether the money spent in salaries is wasted by the number of conversions which they report:

"If the heathen are converted, the money reaches them; if not, not. If they should not be converted at all, the money spent would be wholly absorbed in running a machine which effects no results. When I said that I believe fully three-fourths of the money spent to be thus absorbed, I think I understated, not overstated the truth."

All this is the paltriest sort of dodging. If the missionaries are part of the "machinery"—"the chief part," of it—then all the missionary funds are absorbed in running the machine; and Mr. Abbot's understatement is either pure nonsense or wilful perversion. Suppose that a man knowing as much of chemistry as Mr. Abbot professes to know of missions should say that seventy-five per cent. of water is hydrogen and oxygen. Would that be fairly characterized as an "understatement?"

Mr. Abbot's other friend, who is not a believer in missions, but who claims to have large knowledge of the doings of missionaries and missionary societies in all parts of the world, protests against the accusation with much warmth. Hear him:

"I believe these societies are as honestly and economically managed as the better sort of public institutions—colleges, banks, insurance companies, for instance. Doubtless the whole system of Christian and sectarian propagandism—home as well as foreign—liberal and even radical as well as orthodox—is a mistake. But that is not the point in dispute between The Index and The Independent. The charge made by The Index and denied by The Independent is that three-fourths of the receipts for foreign missions are absorbed by running expenses. I believe with The Independent that 'none of them has ever expended anything like the proportion Mr. Abbot charges them with using.' I think that The Independent is right in calling it a stale slander. I used to hear it forty years ago, and have looked in vain for proof ever since. Christian missions are the modern and improved form of crusades, and, like the Crusades, will probably be followed by important and valuable results—though not the kind of results especially hoped for and died for by crusaders and missionaries. I dislike the pushing, aggressive, provoking, 'propagandist spirit of Christianity' and of Mohammedanism; and I dislike the same spirit, when found, as it sometimes is, in The Index—often in other religious papers—seldom, almost never, in The Independent, during the last few years."

We have hesitated to use in this controversy a weapon put into our hands by our antagonist; but the testimony of Mr. Abbot's friend is so pertinent and valuable, as coming from one who does not believe in missions, that we have not felt at liberty to withhold it. But to this the editor of The Index makes a curious reply. It never entered his head, he says, to suggest that missionary societies are fraudulently or extravagantly managed! "I doubt not," he testifies, "that they are honestly and economically managed, except in rare cases, analogous to the Methodist Book Concern!" We are glad to put on record, for what it is worth, this expression of confidence. It would have been worth much more if the road by which it was reached had been a little less tortuous. Mr. Abbot made a careless statement to begin with, and he ought to have retracted it at once. By seeking to justify it in the manner he has done he has badly damaged his reputation for candor and fairness.

The final result of his criticism is that missions cost more than they come to. They are honestly and economically managed; but the results are not such as to warrant the outlay. To establish this view of the case, he enters into a long argument. In making up his account of the results of missions, he characteristically insists on reckoning out all the influence exerted "in civilizing savages, in improving their morals, and ameliorating their condition here on earth." These "purely secular" fruits are only "indirect" results, he says; and, therefore, not to be considered. But pray, why not? Is it not always claimed that the Gospel of Christ is the best civilizer? Does not the religion of Christ naturally and invariably carry along with it all these gifts of civilization? The civilization can no more be separated from the Christianity than the light can be separated from the sun; and the deliberate attempt of Mr. Abbot to divorce them shows how difficult it is for him to treat this subject with decent impartiality.

But, even judging the missionary system as he insists that it must be judged, by the number of converts made, the case is much better for missions than he has represented. From the "Encyclopædia Britannica" Mr. Abbot learns that in 1858 there were in the Protestant mission churches 215,000 members. These statistics include forty-seven missionary societies, the average term of whose operations had been thirty-nine years. Dividing 215,000 by 39, Mr. Abbot gives as the quotient 5,538, which, he says, is the average annual increase of communicants during that period. The average annual expenditure of these societies during these thirty-nine years has been, as he estimates, $1,500,000. We do not vouch for his figures; but adopt them simply for the sake of the argument. Now let us examine his ciphering:

"Protestant Europe and America combined, as I have shown, with an average annual expenditure of $1,500,000, made for thirty-nine years an average annual increase of 5,538 new converts. At the same rate, with an annual expenditure of $5,000,000, they would make an annual increase of 18,460 new converts. Supposing, therefore, that the present rate of expenditure should continue unchanged, how long would it take to convert the 725,000,000 of the pagan world? And how much would it cost? It would take 39,273 years; and it would cost $196,365,000,000."

All this calculation is based on the supposition that the number of converts bears a certain uniform ratio to the amount of money expended. But the supposition is not according to fact. During the first ten years of the existence of the American Board about $250,000 was expended, and the number of converts was less than two thousand. During the next ten years the expenditure was about $750,000, and the number of converts was more than twenty thousand. The expenditures were multiplied by three, and the converts were multiplied by ten.

Modern missions are, as Mr. Abbot shows, in their infancy. Christianity has been steadily making conquest of the world since the beginning; but the particular phase of its operations which he is criticising is of recent appearance. Thirty-nine years is the average duration of the missionary societies whose statistics he gives us. Is it fair to take the annual average of these thirty-nine years and base on that a calculation of the probable success of missions in the future? A great part of these early years has been spent necessarily by the missionaries in learning and in many cases in forming the language of the heathen, in translating the Bible and religious books, in studying the habits and needs of the people, and in gaining a sure foothold for themselves. Should it be expected that these years of preparation would be as fruitful of direct results as the years that follow? The work of missions is in its seed time. The harvest time has not yet come.

Can Mr. Abbot be ignorant of the fact that the ratio of increase in all healthy social growths is geometrical, rather than arithmetical? Up to 1840 the "average annual increase" of New York City had been about 1,500 a year. Would it have been safe to conclude at that time that 1,500 a year would be the "average annual increase" for the next two hundred years? Or would it even have been sensible to take the increase of population during the year 1840, whatever that may have been, and estimate the growth of the city by adding that amount annually to the population? Yet this is the principle on which Mr. Abbot estimates the future progress of missions.

If the editor of The Index had been publishing a paper in Antioch, about eighteen hundred years ago, when Paul and Barnabas returned from their first missionary journey, he could have made a very effective statement of the ridiculously small results of their labors, when compared with the great work to be accomplished. "Just figure it up for yourselves," he might have said. "It is a simple sum in the Rule of Three. So many years' work, so many converts—a pitiful few; and a thousand millions more or less left to be converted. How long will it take at this rate? It will be millions of years before you will make an impression upon the mass of Paganism." Perhaps he would have said to them what he says to-day to the advocates of missions: "The attempt, therefore, to convert the world by the machinery now employed is so miserably, nay, so ludicrously inadequate that I can compare it to nothing but an attempt by a little boy to dig down Mount [Lebanon] with a teaspoon." Yet in spite of what would have seemed to Mr. Abbot the hopelessness of their task, these men went on with their work; and now, though less than a score of centuries have past, one-quarter of the population of the world owns the Christian name. This simple fact disposes of all the figures of The Index. Granting all that the editor may say about the questionable methods by which Christianity has sometimes been propagated, and the questionable character of many of its adherents, there yet remains much more in the history of the Church than his arithmetic has dreamed of.

Mr. Abbot promises to return to the subject. We trust he will bring with him a little better logic. Free religion may be a good thing; but free mathematics are a snare. Mr. Abbot pronounces missions a stupendous fraud. Be that as it may; the fraud, at least, is no more stupendous than the sophistries with which he seeks to expose it.

An eccentric Scotchman, Farquhar M'Kenzie, recently died in Castleton, near Thurso. More than thirty years ago he took to his bed through religious excitement, and in course of time his body assumed such an abnormal condition that the slightest cold affected him in a most painful manner. The air had as far as possible to be excluded from his bed; his hands kept gloved and his only communication with his friends was through a pane of glass fastened in the curtains. With all this he appeared to be quite in possession of his senses.—Brooklyn Daily Eagle.

MUSINGS.

I sit by the blazing fire alone,
Watching the flames leap up and fall,
And the sages my painless hours have known
Stand in silent rows on the wall.

I think of the hours of earnest talk
When we spoke together of life's sure goal:
"Will the rising veil of the future baulk
The hope divine of the soul?"

We could not read the riddle, we said;
We could not pierce through the lightless gloom;
We saw no more, when the form lay dead;
We saw no flight from the tomb.

But we thought and felt and hoped as one,
When we dreamed of the Love behind the frown,
And we trusted, when faithful toil was done,
Finer toil should be its crown.

On our peering eyes the darkness weighed
With the weight of earthy clods;
But our hope beat back the encroaching shade,
For virtue, we said, is God's.

Alas, how soon thou art called to know!
Was thy trust in vain, O fair young soul?
Was thy life, like the perfume where roses blow,
Exhaled on the boundless Whole?

Or in some higher, some unguessed guise,
Dost thou still live on to love the True,
To climb the heights with a glad surprise,
And a nobler work to do?

Has the bright, pure star that in thee burned,
Star of the spirit's eternal thirst,
Star of a life that sought and yearned,
On the night like a meteor burst?

Or have its timid and trembling rays,
Ere yet it had life's meridian crossed,
To my dazzled eyes in the sudden blaze
Of the daylight of God been lost?

Vain are the babblings of the wise:
I find no prophet or promise sure;
But a low voice sings through our human sighs—
"God loveth a soul so pure!"

Alone I sit by the dying fire,
Gazing alone on the embers red;
And my questioning thought, with vain desire,
Goes sadly out to the dead.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"For many years I have been living in loneliness, struggling with doubts that would not be suppressed, yet fearing to permit them, so opposed were they to what I had been educated to believe was essential for a religious life. But now through your paper I rejoice to find that thousands of hearts and minds throughout the world are battling with the same grave subjects that agitate me, and you seem to me a John the Baptist preparing the way for our emancipation. I believe that we are entering upon a new era,—that love is to have a new ally in science. Love with ignorance and superstition as guides has compelled men to believe that all that is, is right; and the faith which has been born of these has been and still is a curse to humanity, a draw-back to all human progress. But the union of science and love will establish a reign of peace and happiness that ignorance and superstition would forbid man even to hope for. I hope that we shall yet rejoice in a HUMAN friend, so warmed with love and gifted with knowledge as to be a leader and teacher of the world, and a deliverer of the human mind from all which has been very wrong in the past. That that friend is but abiding his time, something whispers me to hope. Meanwhile let us all do what we may to hasten his advent. Thanking you for the hope and comfort I have received in reading your paper, I am an earnest friend of free religion."

"I have not seen a copy of THE INDEX for several months. In company with another I subscribed for it while living in ——. Moving away from that point, my friend has of course received and, I expect, circulated it among others. I have been opening a new farm, and like many others find myself at this particular time unable to raise money enough to pay for a paper; but if, not violating any of your regulations, you could send me THE INDEX, I will send the pay for it between now and Christmas, as I have a pretty good crop in. I find myself very lonesome and ignorant without it."

"It was sent me last year by a friend. I have read some pieces in it with interest, but since I am not at all in sympathy with most that I find in it, I feel that I can expend my money for something to more profit. Please stop my paper."

"I have had very great pleasure in reading the article—'Another Word on Doubt.'"

Like the buttercups in spring, the smiles of little children are about us all the time. Yet how few stop to admire them, or to see in their beauty a hint of the loving heart of Nature?

Question everything but the reality of virtue.

CHRISTIAN LOGIC AND CHRISTIAN RELIGION.

Some wit has said that in the last analysis there are but three styles of retort: "Tu quoque—You're another! Tu mentiris—You lie! Tu damneris—You be damned!" We have just seen an illustration of the second of these three styles where we least expected it, namely, in the New York Independent.

As our readers know, we recently quoted as a "common saying" the statement that "it takes three dollars to send one to the heathen." Where, when, or by whom we first heard this saying used, we cannot tell. We could not even name a single person or a single print as authority for it. We simply know that we remembered it as one of those sayings which occur to every one as among the on dits of mankind. What it meant, therefore, in the mouth of the first man who uttered it, we do not know. What it means to some who have heard it, we have discovered. What it means as we used it, we have fully explained in our first lecture on "Christian Propagandism."

1. In our understanding of it, the phrase was a terse charge that the foreign mission system is enormously expensive,—that, and nothing more. The words state no more, and to us suggested no more; and we meant no more when we first quoted them. It is probable that this was also the meaning of the words as originally used.

2. It turns out that some others regard the phrase as a covert charge of either extravagance or fraud against missionary home offices—and of so outrageous a character as to have no parallel but the robberies of the Tammany Ring of New York.

3. As soon as we perceived that this last was the meaning put upon the phrase by some, we hastened in the most explicit manner to disavow it, as not being our own. We said:—"The writer of this letter evidently understands me to hint, at least, that the missionary societies are fraudulently or extravagantly managed—a thing it never entered my head to suggest." And again, "If it is a charge of financial corruption against the managing boards of missionary societies, it is enough to say that I have neither understood nor used it so."

4. Thus unequivocally disclaiming that we had made a charge of fraud or extravagance, we proceeded to prove the charge as we did make it—the charge, namely, that the foreign missionary system as a whole, including all its operations and expenses, uses up three-quarters of the money expended on it in making the other quarter do all the real work that is done. This is a perfectly intelligible charge. We compared the foreign and home missionary systems to two machines. The former utilizes, we argued, at least no more than twenty-five per cent. of the power applied (i. e. the money), as compared with the latter; and we then proved that this twenty-five per cent. is altogether insufficient to accomplish the end aimed at.

Now an editorial writer in the Independent, whom we have very good reason for believing to be Rev. Washington Gladden, and whose article we copy in full elsewhere, insists that we must have intended the charge we made in the second of the two senses above given, simply because he and others have so understood it. He takes no fair notice of our explicit and repeated denial of having made the charge in that sense, but proceeds solemnly to impeach our personal integrity, because we have not at his dictation humbly confessed ourself both a slanderer and a fool! He taxes us with having "skilfully changed the issue"—with being "guilty of prevarication" and "the paltriest kind of dodging"—with having "badly damaged his [our] reputation for candor and fairness." In fact, he has so far forgotten the manners of a gentleman, and the common decencies of civilized discussion, as to reply to arguments he cannot otherwise meet by shouting out a vulgar and insolent—"You lie!"

Such a style as Mr. Gladden's, so distinguished for the fairness he rebukes us for disregarding, and so admirable for the delicate courtesy which can only be expected in Christian disputants, we shall not hope to rival. We must content ourself with hard argument and plain facts.

The charge that it "takes three dollars to send one to the heathen" is declared by Mr. Gladden to be "silly and meaningless" as we made it. He says:—"Not three-quarters of the money contributed for missions, but the whole of it, is expended for running expenses and salaries of missionaries. . . . What does he [Mr. Abbot] suppose is done with the other quarter?" Why, we suppose that four quarters of the total expenditure are spent on the missionary machine; that three-quarters are consumed in simply running it; and that one quarter does all the work that is actually accomplished. That is, seventy-five per cent. of the power applied to the machine is consumed in overcoming the friction, the resistance of the atmosphere, and so forth; while only twenty-five per cent. is utilized in actual work. This we explained and proved in the lecture that Mr. Gladden finds so "silly and meaningless." The mechanical principles alluded to, however, are of the most elementary kind. Ten years ago we taught Hon. David A. Wells's "Natural Philosophy," in which the distinction is explained between the undershot, the overshot, the breast and the turbine wheels. A class of little girls from ten to twelve years of age found no difficulty in understanding that the undershot wheel utilizes only twenty-five per cent. of the power applied, while the turbine wheel utilizes ninety-five per cent. The distinction between power utilized and power wasted was easily comprehensible by the feminine mind at that early age. But Mr. Gladden finds it "silly and meaningless!"

Being thus unable to comprehend that the foreign missionary system, like the undershot wheel, is a machine which utilizes only twenty-five per cent. of the power applied, and seeing no meaning in our use of the common saying referred to, he adopts the usual tactics of orthodoxy, and impugns our veracity because we do not think exactly as he does. As to the prevalent understanding of the phrase, he may be right, since other and better minds than his have taken it in the same sense. He has, therefore, a show of reason for accusing us of ignorance of the meaning of a common saying as frequently understood. But he takes no notice of the fact that, as soon as we discovered that we had used the saying in another than the most usual sense, we hastened to say so explicitly, and confined ourself to proving the charge in the sense in which we had made it. He has not even a decent pretence for alleging that we "skilfully changed the issue." Does he or any one else give us so little credit for sanity as to suppose that we charged the home managers of the American Board of Foreign Missions with spending $300,000 on themselves, while they spend only $100,000 on all the one hundred missionary stations and the two thousand missionary agents they support abroad? Mr. Gladden must think we hold our reputation for common sense very cheap, when he insists on making us mean, notwithstanding our emphatic disclaimer, that the home managers are guilty of such a flagrant fraud as could not go on a single year without raising a tornado of public indignation that would sweep the whole missionary system into instant annihilation. We do not intend to convict ourself of absolute idiocy, even to oblige Mr. Gladden, nor to allow him to force us into the defence of a slander which would disgrace a madman soaked and steeped in lunacy. Neither shall we allow him to obscure the main point of our argument by trumping up ridiculous accusations of "prevarication." This is the policy of men who are consciously worsted. If he expects to retain the respect of reasonable people, he must argue in a very different style.

We must add a word more. The Independent goes to many thousands of readers beyond the reach of our voice. Before this audience, in our absence, Mr. Gladden has dealt us the most unjust blow we have ever received—has stabbed our reputation as a truthful man. We feign no indifference to an attack of this sort from such a quarter. On the contrary, we deeply feel it. The tone of his article convinces us that he has not done this great injury maliciously, but in the heat of indignation at an imagined falsehood. We have now called his attention to explicit disclaimers he ought by no means to have overlooked, and the overlooking of which has led him into flagrant libel. If his zeal for "candor and fairness" is genuine, as we are inclined to think it is, he will not hesitate to undo the evil he has done. He will tell the readers of the Independent that he did us gross injustice in his hasty charges against our personal honor. Whatever may be his opinion concerning our arguments, he will retract his impeachment of our veracity. If he fails to do this emphatically and unambiguously, we shall see that his chivalrous concern for "candor and fairness" is all a sham; and we shall fall back on the principle that has so often stood us in good stead—the principle that it is not our duty to be thought honest, but to be so.

At some other time we shall reply to Mr. Gladden's strictures on our main argument. It will not be difficult to answer them.

For a most pungent and telling article on the "servant gal" question, see OLD AND NEW for October. It ought to be read, and read profitably, by every "mistress" who feels distracted over the miseries of her fate.

DIVINE PROVIDENCE IN THE CHICAGO FIRE.

It is to be noted that there is little disposition in modern days to interpret the calamity of fire in a city as a punishment by special visitation of the Almighty for the wickedness of the people. Usually such a catastrophe can be too clearly traced to some human or finite cause to allow any credit to be given to such an interpretation. Yet formerly the special agency of Divine Providence was believed to be manifest in cases of great disaster by fire, just as it is now traced by many people, though with quite as little reason, when a city is visited by earthquake or pestilence or tornado. Thus Sodom and Gomorrah, which an old Hebrew tradition represents to have been destroyed by fire, have been gibbeted in religious history, though probably they were not worse than other cities, as standing examples of communities that were punished for their sins by a direct retribution from heaven. But in the olden time, when every sort of superstition was rife and man felt himself utterly helpless amidst the forces of Nature if they broke away from their accustomed channels, it is not strange that the destructive ravages of fire should have been regarded as a special manifestation of Almighty Power.

In our times reason and science have pretty effectually dispelled this form of superstitious belief. In the comments of the press on the Chicago fire, I have not seen anywhere a hint that there was any Special Providence in that disaster. Some of the religious newspapers and some of the clergy very likely will take this view of the matter; but the secular press is utterly free from it; and it is safe to say that not many persons who allow themselves to reason on religious questions will venture to suggest that the Almighty burned up Chicago as a punishment for its own wickedness, or as a warning to other cities to put away their wickedness if they would be saved from a like doom. Yet one can but ask, why is there any more Special Providence when the calamity comes by earthquake or tornado or pestilence than when it comes by fire? Certainly, if the Almighty were to resort to such outbursts of power in order specially to teach a doctrine of moral retribution, He could do it quite as easily through the agency of a careless, ignorant woman and an intractable cow and a kerosene lamp, as through the violence of a tempest or a poisoned atmosphere or volcanic heavings of the earth. To be consistent, the doctrine of Special Providence must be abandoned in all cases; but not therefore the doctrine of Universal Providence.

For we are not to run to the other extreme and declare that nothing is to be learned of the ways of Divine Power from such calamities. In fact there is very much to learn; and man cannot study the lesson too well. I do not suppose that the Infinite Being was any nearer Chicago in the flames of that terrific fire which swept away her prosperity and joy than he was when her people were buoyant with hope and her homes smiling with happiness. Neither was He farther away. The religious fanatics who in their terror cried that God had come down in judgment and that this was the end of the world, and the skeptical fanatic who, mounting the Court-house steps, mockingly asked the affrighted crowd, "Where is now your God? Why doesn't He send the angels to save you?" were equally wide of the real truth to be learned. Both stood, indeed, on precisely the same plane of thought and evidence with regard to the nature of Divine Being and the methods of Providence,—both believed that, if there be a God, He would reveal himself in some miraculous way, only one accepted the alleged evidence and the other did not.

Yet Almighty Power was present in that calamity, though in a way that neither of these classes of persons understood. He was there in the working of natural law. He was there vindicating the claims of natural law to be studied and obeyed by man. He was there as Providence, but as a Providence that manifests itself in Law. This, in various forms, is the central lesson of such a disaster.

There are many special lessons to be learned,—as, for instance, the importance of knowledge and of thoughtful care in the use of those natural elements that are our daily servants, but which may become so destructive when we lose control; the importance of building, as far as possible, so as to prevent such a catastrophe; the importance of some more efficient method for checking a conflagration at its first outbreak; the importance of organization and system in the forces that are brought to bear against such a disaster. These latter, proceeding from some commanding mind that gets control of the enlisted sympathies, excited temperaments, and vagrant rush of effort, are the inworking in human affairs of that orderly intelligence which is ever striving to put the forces of Nature into the service of construction and to evoke creation out of chaos.

But all special lessons are summed up in this,—that man is to find the intelligent Providence that is manifest in all natural elements and forces by learning their law and putting himself in harmonious relation with it. How puny is man even at his greatest strength, how utterly helpless, when by some ignorance or heedlessness or vice he loses control of the forces of Nature, and becomes their victim instead of making them his servants! Chicago was as good a material representative as the age could furnish of man's might. It was a product of human energy at which the world gazed in wonder and pride. The marvel was that it had all come in thirty years. But in as many hours it is swept away by a natural power before which all human energy bent and broke and withered, as a reed in the wind. One of those simple forces of Nature which, when controlled and kept in the groove of an intelligent purpose, had been one of the chief agents in building up the city, breaking away from such restraint, undid and destroyed the work in a day. Somewhere the magical touch was lost by which mind is to keep mastery of these mighty powers of Nature; and hence all this catastrophe and woe. There then lies the great lesson of the disaster, the lesson which Divine forethought would certainly have us learn:—"Keep mind and will alert to conform to Nature's laws, and her forces are your servants, bringing to you all nourishment and blessing; lose control, whether in the sphere of material things or moral, and you are those forces' slave and victim."

W. J. P.

[Mr. Potter's expectation of the relative degrees of common sense to be displayed by the "secular" and "religious" press with reference to the notion that Chicago was burned for its sins, is confirmed by our own observation. That stout old war-horse of mediæval superstition, Zion's Herald, says:—

"We learn the punishment of sin. Chicago was no worse than other cities, and no better. Iniquity abounded. The city was full of hell fire, as well as earth fire. The flames of the pit burned freely, and without much attempt to suppress them. The Sabbath was a day of sinful pleasure and business to a great mass of its population. The bar, the grog-shop, the beer cellar, the brothel were its most popular and profitable haunts. The theatres lured its youth to the viler banquets of flesh and spirit. The greed of gain swallowed up higher faculties in many natures, and left a burnt ash-heap for a soul. These universally raging fires made this fire a necessity."

We expected to find this comical fanaticism in full flower in the Herald, and were not mistaken. But if the Lord burned Chicago for being "no worse than other cities," why does he not burn the other cities for being no worse than Chicago? If Chicago's vice made this fire a "necessity," why does not the equal vice of Boston, Toledo, New York, and the minor metropolises, make their conflagration an equal necessity? But while the Herald thus rather confusedly declares the whole counsel of God, let us hear what is said by the Onondaga Standard, of Syracuse, N. Y.:—

"We regret, however, that some of our clergymen, in a too close alliance with the traditionary, though now rapidly disappearing, teachings of a stern theology, were disposed to treat the Chicago disaster as a special visitation of the wrath of God upon the beautiful city for the sins of which she has heretofore been guilty. She is scourged for her iniquities."

Against such a doctrine, monstrous in itself and one that in the theological strifes of history has been monstrously perverted, we, from the lay pulpit of the Nineteenth Century, protest. . . . We distinctly affirm that the entire tendency of latter-day opinion is towards the conclusion that, while God undoubtedly exercises a personal supervision over mundane affairs, He operates through natural laws, working as invariably as the will from which they spring."

It may not be inopportune to add that Mr. Potter's most forcible article was received before he could possibly have seen our editorial of last week.—Ed.]

TOO EARLY BLIGHTED.

It is with great pain that we are compelled to chronicle the sad tidings contained in the following editorial article from the Milwaukee Sentinel of Oct. 11:—

DEATH OF MISS LILLIE PECKHAM.—The intelligence which we have to announce this morning, of the death of Miss Lillie Peckham, of this city, will be both painful and startling, not only to her many personal friends, but to the entire community. She died yesterday morning at the residence of Dr. Hanson, after an illness of a few weeks. No apprehension was felt on her account, her physicians considering her recovery certain up to an early hour yesterday morning, when a sudden change took place, and death speedily followed. This talented young woman was well known throughout the country as an earnest advocate of the woman's rights movement, as also of every progressive work. Only a few weeks since she made a successful tour through the West, speaking in various city pulpits. She was in sympathy with the Free Religious movement, and bravely and fearlessly spoke all that she had come to feel was truth, though it shook the very foundations of old creeds and ideas. Many efforts from her scholarly pen attest to her talent, her enthusiasm, her industry, and her devotion to every onward movement of the hour. She was to have entered the Cambridge Divinity School early in the present autumn, but was prevented by this illness, which has proved so sadly fatal. She had chosen the ministry for her life-work. That a life so full of earnest purpose and promise of usefulness should be so suddenly stopped is irreconcilable with our finite judgment. We question the justice and demand an immortality to complete and fulfil. It is hard to say, "It is well;" though God's fact may be that this young life, with its beauty of character, its sisterly affection, its still larger sisterly sympathy with a suffering humanity, its longings and aspirations, its zealous strivings after the true and good, is full and complete now; still we shall mourn her loss, and miss her word and work, and bewail her brief though beautiful career.

Many of our readers will remember that Miss Peckham took an active part in the Conventions of the Free Religious Association at Indianapolis and Toledo last year; and they will also remember many striking articles of hers in the pages of THE INDEX. She had become enthusiastically interested in Free Religion, and for this reason alone accepted a position, at a merely nominal salary, as our general assistant during the summer and autumn of 1870, pursuing her own studies at the same time with such advice and help as we could give. It was her purpose to fit herself for the ministry of Free Religion, fully sympathizing as she did with the principles and position of THE INDEX.

Never have we known a mind quicker to apprehend and appreciate the value of great ideas; or a character more singularly brave and unselfish in advocating them. Her moral courage was that of a man, but tempered with all a woman's sweetness. Had it not been for a certain irresolution or lack of persistency, which prevented the application of her fine powers continuously and exclusively to a single aim, she would have shone with conspicuous lustre among the famous women of her time. Her early death has cut off the bright future we notwithstanding hoped and expected for her; and the falling leaves of autumn, beautiful in their quick decay, fittingly symbolize the career of this faithful friend, this brilliant, lovely, and most noble woman. May her grave be strewn with flowers!

RELIGION AND GENTILITY.

In Miss Muloch's pleasant account of her journey in "Fair France," occurs the following conversation with the driver of a diligence:—

"We asked if the ceremony of extreme unction was common at dying beds?"

"Universal. Nobody would be considered genteel (that is the nearest English equivalent I can find to our friend's expression) without it. Anyhow, it does no harm. The women believe it does them good."

"But do you believe it?"

"Ah ca!" And the four men laughed at one another, evidently considering this a capital joke.

"They should have wives of their own—these priests—and then they would not come bothering ours. It is all their doing. Religion is for priests and women. We men are different."

"Then, when you come to die, of course you will not send for the priest?"

"Of course I shall! It is the fashion—la mode. One must do as one's neighbors do, or what would they say?"

So even here was the omnipresent Mrs. Grundy, driving people into Paradise the "genteel" way. It is ludicrous and yet sad too; judging by the half-cynical and wholly contemptuous expression of the honest peasant-face, as, a few minutes after, our driver took his hat off quite civilly to a fat priest whom we met."

This reduction of religion to gentility is a consequence of its foundation in miraculous authority, and, however "ludicrous" or "sad," is perfectly natural, and congruous with all the circumstances. It is religion appearing as conventionality after it has disappeared as vital and sincere conviction. But why does it not disappear altogether when its original character has gradually faded away? It is, I suppose, because of the baleful persistence of the authority-idea, which has represented so much force on the one side and so much subjection on the other, that, when it is overthrown in one shape, it is only to glide into some correlated form for which its previous activity prepared the way. What is conventionality but the more easy, yet possibly the more subtle social ascendancy of the same principle of authority that has dominated in religion? It is essentially the same act, whether the independence of the spirit is sacrificed to a dogma, a fashion, or a public hue and cry. The poison lies in the sacrifice; the particular fetic is unimportant.

But as one mode of authority passes away, another is created or re-inforced. It seems as if the spirit of liberty were too strong to leave the human soul open to unlimited abasement under tyranny. Only one mode of despotism, as it were, can flourish vigorously at once; so that it is just when the authority of priest and ritual decline that social tyranny will rise with its conventional exactions, and religion, no longer felt, will be professed as a conventionality. Each succeeding form of authority may be expected to be weaker in pretensions than its forerunner: yet it may be more difficult to deal with, as being less avowed, more distributed, less concentrated and visible; and it is certainly a gigantic evil of religious authority that it tends inevitably, as real conviction declines, to relegate religion into the domain of a sneering, or, as is much more often the case, an easy-going and torpid conventionality.

I believe it is Mill who describes this age as one especially deficient in marked individuality, and far inferior in this respect to the more unrestrained and less delicate feudal time. Yet that same time when fashion had so little power was the era of the most vigorous ascendancy of ecclesiastical authority, which at heart had the merit, for the most part, of genuine sincerity, and was a religious condition far superior, as it appears to me, to that mixture of feeble cotton-warp authority with conventional profession which constitutes the current Protestant Christianity of to-day. Conventionality in all matters has now reached such great distribution, and is accordingly a tyranny that knows so well how to make up in subtilty what it lacks in actual compelling power, that the sober and cool-headed Mill advises the encouragement of all harmless eccentricities and contends that non-conformity is in itself a good, even though it have no particular reform at heart.

J. V. B.

The leading article of this week's INDEX is a clear and vigorous argument against the proposed Christian Amendment to the United States Constitution, by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, of Enon Valley, Pa. We have been obliged to omit considerable portions of this argument on account of its length; but it will be immediately issued entire in the form of an "Index Tract." Mr. Bradford writes from a position within the lines of Christianity; but no one could write more liberally or more conclusively against the stupendous but dangerous folly of this Christian Amendment. Whoever desires to enlighten the public mind on a question that threatens to assume alarming proportions in the not far distant future, will scarcely find a more able, pungent, or succinct treatment of it than this tract. We hope to receive large orders for it.

Among the sufferers by the Chicago fire was the Present Age. Col. D. M. Fox, its editor, writes us that this is the third time he has thus lost all by fire. But the publication of the paper is to be resumed, and before long, it is hoped, with the same size as before. We regard the Present Age as, on the whole, the most liberal of all the Spiritualist papers, because it does not confine itself to Spiritualism, but devotes a considerable portion of its energies to reform and free thought in general. It would seem no more than just that its friends should rally to its support. Terms $3.00 a year. Address the editor, 364 Warren St., Chicago.

THOMAS CARLYLE'S MOTHER.—Before setting out for Berlin to make certain inquiries in connection with his "Life of Frederick the Great," he went down to spend a few days with his mother in the old house at home. On the morning when he was to take his departure for the South, a crowd of old friends were assembled on the railway platform at Ecclefechan to see him off—schoolfellows and the trusty allies of the bygone years with whom he had

"Paid'd in the burn,
And pu'd the gowans fine."

On entering the railway office, putting his hands into his coat-pocket, he discovered there something bulky, of the presence of which he did not seem to have been aware.

Opening the mysterious parcel, he saw that it contained some nice, home-made Dumfriesshire bannocks, which his fond old mother—just as when he was a little boy at school—had stowed away (this time surreptitiously) in the pocket.

This discovery was too much for him; simple as the circumstance was, it moved him greatly, carried him back over the years to days of "Auld lang syne," and when his friends gathered around him to grasp his hand and say good-by, his eyes were suffused with many tears.—Christian Register.

John Newton was speaking of the death of a lady. "Oh, sir!" said a young lady, "how did she die?" "There is a more important question," said Newton, "which you should have asked first,—How did she live?"

WORDS TO THE POINT FROM A BUSINESS MAN.

AUGUSTA, KAN., Sept. 30, 1871.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—Your paper of the 30th inst. has just reached me; and in response to the appeal of its inclosure, the Supplement, please place my name among the stockholders for One Hundred Dollars.

That there are more devices used by the orthodox church to inculcate certain doctrinal tenets rather than truth and right, or the principles of moral philosophy, no reflecting reader or observer can doubt. Separate the principles of ethics from church teachings, and what have you left worth clinging to? The placards suspended in all orthodox Sabbath schools, containing such inscriptions as—"Follow Me," "Feed my Lambs," "Love Jesus," "Remember the Heathen," and thousands of similar wishy-washy trash illustrate my meaning. Hardly ever do you see such mottoes as—"Do Right," "Obligations to Man are Obligations to God," "Truth and Right," and so forth,—the fundamental principles of eternal RIGHT. There can be no doctrine more divine than that embracing the unvarnished principles of ethics. That doctrine is as old as the human race, and has sprung from no historical religion.

Yours truly,
LEWIS KURTZ.

INTUITION AND ITS AUTHORITY.

By those who claim the right of free thought there is nothing esteemed of greater importance than the knowledge of truth. In the pursuit of it, transmitted ideas, received early and without reflection, and long rested in as settled facts, come to be analyzed, and a reason for their assumed authority demanded. Single words, even, on which may hinge much discussion, and the truth or falsity of whose generally received significance may lead to widely different conclusions, are subjected to the same scrutiny.

In this challenging process for the attainment of truth, the word Intuition is called upon to give proof that there is something in mental experience corresponding to the idea generally attached to it. As used, it seems to stand for a certain interior light in the soul, or direct influx of divine intelligence, giving certain knowledge of truth, and more to be relied upon than any declarations of reason. If this is so, we have only to look within to discover absolute truths of the greatest moment, and at the same time to find quiet repose for the spirit, when anxious questionings have brought it into a state of unrest.

But what if these "intuitions" differ or are at variance in different minds? One may have full "intuitive" faith in a personal, self-conscious God, and in a life beyond the present—a certainty that nothing can shake—to carry him through life and death. Another is entirely destitute of this faith; neither prayers nor tears can secure it to him, yearn for it and agonize for it as he may. Does the good Father of all bestow this inestimable blessing on the one unsought, and withhold it from the most earnest longings of the other? I have a friend who says to me—"I know (intuitively) that my Savior died for me." Another affirms, with as much positiveness, that there can be no truth in such a doctrine. What now becomes of intuition as an authority to man? What, indeed, can be alleged as proof of the existence of such a supposed faculty? What is simply the truth of the matter in the order of Nature? Truth being of infinitely more consequence than any thing else, what matter on which side of a question it is, provided only it be found?

How can it be shown that what are called "intuitions" are anything more than simple perceptions arrived at in periods of mental life so early that no trace of the process is retained—a legitimate inference from the statements of Maudsley—or that they are notions, first started, perhaps, in the infancy of races, and transmitted along the ages with such additions or modifications as each might furnish, which have been received by us as unquestionable truths, and accepted with no act of our own reason, and with no recollection how we came by them?

Moreover, may not the so-called "intuition" faculty be greatly modified by constitution or temperament, the material elements of one's nature being through peculiar circumstances so attuned to the spiritual as to form an introverted and mystical character of mind, which, by habitually acting upon itself, comes to mistake its own conclusions, perhaps unconscious ones, for an influx of truth from a source exterior to itself, or possibly attributes them to an "indwelling God" as the source of their inspiration?

A clergyman, once my "pastor," seems eminently thus constituted. It has been said of him that he has "religious genius." While listening to his earnest, soulful utterances, his countenance lighted up with a look of inspiration in which his whole frame also shared, and which seemed the result of penetration "within the veil," I have felt assured, for the time being, that his "intuitions" must be trustworthy.

But ever again returns the question—what evidence is there that this is not the result of mind acting upon itself in some mysterious way consequent upon peculiar organization, together with the influences of early impressions and of education? Where is the authority to my mind for what another says he knows by "intuition?"

APPEAL OF THE RELIEF COMMITTEE

OF THE FIRST SOCIETY OF SPIRITUALISTS OF CHICAGO, ILL., TO THE FRIENDS OF HUMANITY EVERYWHERE, IN BEHALF OF THE SUFFERERS FROM THE LATE DISASTROUS CONFLAGRATION OF OUR CITY.

It is just one week after the fire, when its smoldering embers are fast dying out; when the feverish excitement and apprehensive terror lest the terrible fire should again start forth in its mad career, and scatter its destroying brands over the remaining portion of our once fair city, is somewhat allayed.

Now that the fever which burned our very hearts with anguish is giving place to dread of the coming chills soon to replace it, during the terrible, long and unprepared-for winter, we turn to the sympathies of the world of humanity, with hearts sore and bruised, but not despairing, asking for aid and sympathy.

Many, many thousands are without clothing, bedding, food, fuel, money, homes, and every thing necessary to sustain life through the rigors of a cold and inclement season, which already begins to tell upon them in their thinly-clad and otherwise destitute condition.

With all this want and desolation pressing us into service, the First Society of Spiritualists of this suffering city have appointed a Relief Committee to secure and distribute aid, the sufferers among whom are not a few of our own association. Many of our loved Lyceum children are to day homeless, and their parents and friends destitute. We ask you for sympathy and aid, assuring you that we are prepared to receive and distribute your contributions. The committee are organized and in working order, confident that we need only to make this known to secure a hearty response from those who sympathize with suffering humanity.

OBSERVATIONS ABROAD.

[CONCLUDED.]

ATLANTIC OCEAN, July 27, 1871,
(while returning from Europe).

EDITOR INDEX:—

The individuals that I had occasion to converse with belonged to very different classes of society; but they were mostly professional men, and among these not a few were educators. Within the latter class I found none who could be termed a "believer" in Christianity; but, while most of them considered this religion as a commodious old gown, good enough to wear yet for the sake of its commodity, some promptly had cast it aside and stood boldly upon the platform of rationalism. As, in the strict division of school and state in most educational institutions, such principles are not subject to criticism on the part of the authorities, it may well be judged that the growing generation are not averse to ideas that naturally suit the young mind more readily than the catechism.

While I seldom heard the principles of Christianity as to morality attacked, I not unfrequently heard the Bible on account of its admixture of impure and profane narrations, misleading oftener than correcting the young mind, relentlessly condemned.

The adoration and veneration, offered to the Deity is, excepting in Catholic countries, not so much a matter of law, custom and usage as of an exuberance of good feeling in days of joy, in which case it assumes the form of thanksgiving; or when, in days of trial and danger, an invocation of a higher Power is resorted to—vide Emperor William's despatches and proclamations,—it seems to satisfy the popular ideas and savors much of the oft quoted phrase—"Pray to God, but keep your powder dry!"

As the observance of the Sabbath is more or less an indicator of the prevalence or lack of Christian ritualism, I may safely say that by this standard there could be found but little, if any, traces of such observance, at least in the larger cities of Germany and France. As I can speak only of the places where I passed a Sunday, I'll name Hamburg, Brunswick, Leipzig, Mayence, Coblenz and Paris; and I must say that in all these places, with the exception of Paris, all handiwork was stopped. At Paris the rebuilding and repairing of private as well as public buildings was carried on not only on Sundays, but late and early, before and after the regular working hours, mornings and nights. I found also those stores and stalls for the sale of merchandise closed, that expected little or no traffic on Sunday; while all other establishments, that might furnish any necessities or accommodations for this day, were invariably open and frequented by customers. The closing or keeping open of those establishments seemed invariably to be only a question of policy and independent of any civil statute. The ringing of harmonious church bells naturally re-awakened impressions of my early childhood: for even then I thought that those glorious sounds in their ever changing rhythm, might better be listened to from the quiet woods, or in view of grand natural scenery, while enjoying the fragrant breath of a bright May or June morning, than from inside those damp and dismal edifices in which, equally cold and chilly, the stern parson preached against those that did not come more frequently to the "house of God."

I saw and joined the crowds of happy people who sought the country, the woods, and the mountains, as in Harzburg, Berlin, or Coblenz, to pass the Sunday; husband, wife, and children start out with baskets and pails, not omitting the various instruments of sport for young and old children. I saw them squatting along the shady road-side, the rivulet, the rocky ledge, happy and contented and, no doubt, thanking their Creator with more heartfelt earnestness and devotion for the happiness they enjoyed, than they could have done at any other place, where persuasion or restraint might have forced them to go.

I saw them in Summer-gardens where art and fancy vied with Nature to provide attractions, that no church architect, even in refined America, with velvet carpets, soft cushions, warm or balmy atmosphere, and the gaudy display of costly finery of the audience, can approach. I saw them following the passages of beautiful music with open ears, their features reflecting the emotions of pleasure and satisfaction. Not unfrequently I heard them join in general chorus the strains of a patriotic or other favorite melody. Rowdiness is so foreign to these occasions, that I am unable to report the first case, or any approach to it, during my whole stay in Europe; and I can add with the same veracity that, Paris excepted, where a few soldiers were laboring under the influence of liquor, but one case of drunkenness ever came to my observation during my whole stay in Europe. Though I did not specially seek, I surely did not avoid an occasional look into places where rum ruled king, and where the scum of society congregated; and even there I saw little of that roughness and rowdiness so characteristic of our Sunday-law-ridden states.

The love for music and the dance has surely more influence upon the lower classes than is the case in America, and undoubtedly does not predispose them to such scandalous bestiality as is frequently met with on our side of the Atlantic.

That temperance (not abstinence) is necessary to avoid this evil there as well as here, no one can deny; but that this temperance cannot be secured by legislation, our own experience well enough demonstrates, while universal, and (if necessary) compulsory education must furnish the slow but sure means of elevating our masses to the standard of proper manhood. K.

GEN. B. F. BUTLER.—We have a very good story of the Hon. B. F. Butler, that has not yet found its way in the newspapers:—When a student in college, it was binding on the students to attend the college church—a duty which to him was very irksome. On one occasion he heard the preacher (who was also a professor), advancing propositions like the following:

1. That the elect alone would be saved.
2. That among those who, by the world, were called Christians, probably not more than one in a hundred belonged really and truly to the elect.
3. That the others, by reason of their Christian privileges, would suffer more hereafter than the Heathen who had never heard the Gospel at all. Mr. Butler, whose audacity was as conspicuous as his reverence, made a note of these propositions, and on the strength of them drew up a petition to the faculty, soliciting exemption from further attendance at the church, as only preparing himself for a more terrible future. For, said he, the congregation here amounts to six hundred persons, and nine of these are professors.

Now, if only one in a hundred is to be saved, it follows that three even of the faculty must be damned. He (Benjamin F. Butler), being a mere student could not expect to be saved in preference to a professor. Far, he said, be it from him to cherish so presumptuous a hope! Nothing remained for him, therefore, but perdition! In this melancholy posture of affairs he was naturally anxious to abstain from anything that might aggravate his future punishment; and, as church attendance had been shown in last Sunday's sermon to have this influence on the non-elect, he trusted that the faculty would, for all time coming, exempt him from it!

The result of this petition, written out in an imposing manner, and formally presented to the faculty was that Butler received a public reprimand for irreverence, and but for the influence of one or two friends in the faculty, he would have been expelled.—American Workman.

DANGEROUS.—An old lady read an item in one of the papers, the other day, describing how a grindstone burst in a saw factory, and killed four men. She just happened to remember that there was a small grindstone down in the cellar, leaning up against the wall. So she went out and got an accident insurance policy, and then, summoning the hired girl, and holding the pie-board in front of her, so that if the thing exploded her face would not be injured, she had the stone taken out in the alley, where twenty-four buckets of water were thrown on it, and a stick was stuck in the hole, bearing a placard marked "dangerous." She says it's a mercy the whole house was not blown to pieces by the thing before this.—Revolution.

INDEX TRACTS

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION have published the following tracts, and will publish others of a similar character, if encouraged to do so by the receipt of enough orders to cover the expense:—

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no abler, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Fifteen copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. It gives reliable statistics showing that, at the lowest estimate, this system would take about Forty Thousand Years to convert the world; and quotes the highest authorities proving the utter failure of the Catholics to civilize the Paraguay Indians, and of the Protestants to civilize the Sandwich Islanders, in any true sense of the word. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Fifteen copies One Dollar.

Also, the scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition by PARKER PILLSBURY, entitled "The Sunday Question," is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

Friends of Free Religion wishing to assist the publication of such tracts as these will please donate such sums as they think proper, which will be applied exclusively to this purpose. Address—

Second Series, Just Published—

21. Fanaticism: how displayed by well-meaning people in their judgment and action respecting religion in others.
22. Let your Faith honor God, not calumniate Him: reject all testimony that speaks ill of God.
23. Who Wrote It? a proper and needful inquiry when an unreasonable claim is urged on the ground that "it is written."
24. Periodical Prayer: ask when you want to ask; thank when you want to thank: be honest in prayer.
25. Hear the other Side: seek an intelligent faith, instead of blindly following ignorance and prejudice.
26. Man's Duty to God: above all things do not neglect it; but take care, too, not to be misled in regard to it.
27. Penny-wise, Pound-foolish: to claim divine inspiration for unworthy imputation on the divine character.
28. A Touchstone for false Teachers: God certainly gave reason and conscience to be our guides.
29. Justice and Love vs. Mercy: God's actual method better than the supposed "plan of salvation."
30. Prepared to Die: an unveiling of some clerical false pretences.
31. "Even as Others": showing a point of resemblance between the "evangelicals" and those believers whom they stigmatize as "unbelievers."
32. Do Men need Salvation? a look towards God directly, not through the dark-stained church-windows.
33. Unchangeable: will God ever refuse to welcome the repenting and returning sinner?
34. Lost Sinners: men sometimes lose their children: did God ever lose, can he lose, his children?
35. Times and Seasons: two false notions considered; one about Friday, one about Sunday.
36. Do they really believe it? cases where Orthodoxy follows tradition in opposition to Scripture.
37. The Boston Revival and its Leader: methods of operation of Rev. A. B. Earle, professional revivalist.
38. He Rejects the Bible: a false charge refuted, and the opposing truth clearly shown.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Circulars with list of subjects will be sent on application.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

SELF-LOVE. [FOR THE INDEX.]

A DISCOURSE BY REV. O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

"Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

MATT. xxii. 39.

I wish to fix your attention for a moment on a point that is usually passed over in complete silence, but which yet has some significance in the Christian Ethics. It is that Self-Love is made the basis of the system: not the aim or result of the system, but the basis of it: not the last principle of it, but the first principle of it. "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Love yourself little, love your neighbor little; love yourself much, love your neighbor much; hate yourself, hate your neighbor; despise yourself, despise your neighbor. Attention is called at once, you will observe, to SELF. Regard is centred on self. Self is the starting point; self is the standard. The love of self is the test of all love; the love of self is the foremost of duties, because, until that is made intelligent, rational, strong and deep, all other love must be unintelligent, weak and shallow. The Christian education, therefore, is an education in Self-Love—not in self-forgetfulness or self-contempt or self-abandonment or self-sacrifice.

The great author of the system showed his matchless wisdom in this way of stating his doctrine; for, beyond question, the most important personage to every one is himself. The strongest element in human nature is love of self. The one indestructible principle in the conduct of human life is self-assertion, self-inference, self-aggrandisement, the desire to attain personal happiness under one definition or another. It is questionable, indeed, whether the element of self-love does not enter into every form and manifestation of human affection; whether it can ever be distanced, outgrown or eradicated; whether all love is not self-love. Benevolence is a gratification of the impulse of good-will, and is practised because it gives pleasure to a certain class of personal feelings. Disinterestedness is interestedness indulging itself in the luxury of making somebody else happy; and has all the keen zest of a sense of superiority coupled with a sense of generosity or pity. It is a very exquisite kind of self-flattery. The mother loves herself so supremely in her child: it is her child; the credit of its beauty of charm comes back to her; her own self-complacency is mixed up every moment with her tenderness. Her sacrifices are no sacrifices, because her own peace of mind is involved in their making. She would be miserable if she did not practise consecration. She would suffer if she did not suffer for her babe. She might see another child die, and shed no tear; for it is not hers: but her child is the heart of her heart, is the essence of herself, and the more she forgets herself in it, the more she remembers herself.

Why do men worship? In order that by their worship they may please the Being they adore and get some good as yet unattained, or escape some evil that impends. They love God in order that God may love them. They pray to God that He may grant them favors. They serve Him that He may bestow on them rewards. What does heaven mean but happiness? What is the longing for heaven but the longing for happiness? What is aspiration but the sigh for the fullness of personal joy? Religion does not annihilate Self: it perpetuates it; extends it; carries it on into new spheres; gives it new and more sublime manifestations. The very essence, nay, the quintessence of human selfishness has usually appeared in Religion. There selfishness has been baptized, consecrated, sublimated, transfigured. Prayers push selfishness into the very face of God. What astounding selfishness is compressed into the doctrine of Immortality as commonly held! Why, if good people who denounce selfishness in this world, could but see how intensely selfish they were themselves in regard to the next world, they would fairly stand aghast and doubt whether in all their longing for heaven they had not been getting up an appetite for hell—qualifying themselves for damnation while thirsting for bliss. If self-love be a sin, then the chief of sinners are the orthodox saints, for they demand a private happiness nothing short of infinite and everlasting.

I make these statements simply that you may perceive how stubborn this element of self-love is; how it constantly reappears under the strangest disguises, and asserts itself under the most remote relations and insists on regulating our purposes and ruling our wills, even when we seem to have resigned ourselves to divine influences. All love is self-love under one or another form.

This being so in fact, philosophy must assume the fact and base its rules upon it. We have seen that Jesus does so; that the teachers of practical wisdom in common life do so, is too plain to require explanation. It is, at present, with their philosophy, not with his, that I wish to deal. The practical doctrine based on the great fact of self-love, is something like this: That the individual is and must be of prime interest to himself; his own self-preservation, his own pleasure, his own comfort, his own physical and social well-being, claim his foremost, nay, his exclusive regard. No man can live for another, for the simple reason that he is not another. Every one has his own view of well-being and of pleasure. Every one must determine for himself what are the means fitted to attain it. Constitutions are unlike; tastes differ; each has his own estimate of happiness, and of the proper way to gain it. The only judge, therefore, of what is good as an end or good as a means must be the individual himself. There can be no other. The true interest of a man is the greatest sum of happiness which he is capable of attaining, and the true interest of society is the greatest sum of happiness of all the individuals that constitute it. The duty of the individual, therefore, on this principle, is to love himself first, to build up his own private estate, to multiply his own personal fortunes, to increase his own individual privileges in every honest and honorable way by all means that do not limit, cramp, injure or wrong his neighbor. Let every one act on this rule and every one will attain his full welfare. Let every one look out for himself and all will be looked out for. Let each mind his own business and no business will go unattended, each interest being conducted by the person best capable of conducting it. Every interest will be considered and adjusted to every other. There can be no clashing so long as each attends to his own affairs.

"All Nature's difference makes all Nature's peace." We must suppose that God has constructed human nature no less carefully than He has constructed material nature. It would be a reflection on the wisdom and equity of Providence to believe that the mechanism of society is less complete than the mechanism of the solar system. Man considered as a piece of divine handiwork must be accepted as perfect; and if obedience to the laws of their being secures order, harmony, development, progress among the plants or the constellations, surely obedience to the laws of their being would secure order, harmony, development, progress among men and women. Now if self-love is that law, the consistent and faithful practice of self-love will lead to increasing power, wealth, health, comfort and conscious well-being.

And so pursuing the argument, we arrive at this conclusion, that we show love to our neighbor by letting him severely alone, and at full liberty to love himself. We are not to interfere with one another in any way, either with ill will or with good will, either to harm them or to help them, either to do them evil or to do them good. If they cannot help themselves, we cannot help them. If they do not care for themselves, it is presumptuous in us to imagine that we can care for them. If they do not love themselves, it is absurd for us to come in with offers of love for them. None should know as well as they what they are, what they need, what they desire. If they do not know, their knowledge is hopeless. Our proffer of assistance is an interference with their individuality, and all interference with another's individuality, no matter on what plausible pretence of benevolence, is an unwarrantable impertinence. Their concerns are no concerns of ours, and to meddle with their concerns cannot be justified on any plea of charity. Well entertained it may be, amiable and sweet, but it is illegitimate and must in the end be injurious. The law of individuality is supreme in its sanctity, and it is its firm observance, not its weak violation, that ensure happiness at last.

Pushing the idea a little further, then we come to this: That one of the solemn duties of men is to abstain from beneficence, to eschew philanthropy, to withhold aid, to deny themselves the luxury of almsgiving under every enticing form. To say that we should not be forced into charity is not enough. If we are to be forced into anything, it should be into uncharitableness. Our discipline should be in saying "no," not in saying "yes," in curbing the benevolent propensities, not in liberating them; in withholding, not in giving.

Why should I be taxed, this doctrine says, to maintain the poor? Poverty is a great misfortune, but the only way out of it is the way of effort, endurance, struggle on the part of those who are in it. Help from the outside, however comforting for the moment, like a cup of spirits to a man fatigued, weakens more than it strengthens, for it is just so much release from the necessary effort, it is just so much dishonest escape from the regenerating endeavor, it is just so much enfeebling of purpose, just so much exhaustion of nervous force, just so much encouragement to self-neglect and self-abandonment, just so much outrage on the sole conditions of personal independence.

Why should I pay for educating other people's children? If they want education, let them get it for themselves as they can. If they are unable to procure it, let them wait till their ability increases. When they really feel the want of education, they will contrive to obtain it by effort and saving, which will in themselves be an education. Let those who want schools make schools as they are wanted. Let those who do not want schools be allowed to spend their money for what they do want. There will be fewer schools on this principle, no doubt; fewer and less richly endowed—less completely furnished; but such as there are will be supported by those who need them and who are immediately interested in their being as good as the means at their disposal will allow.

Again, why should I devote a portion of my income to the maintenance of dispensaries for the sick, hospitals for the maimed, the diseased, or the insane, asylums for the unfortunate, houses of refuge for the vicious, reform schools for the criminal, &c.? Let each one look after his own sick, attend to his own diseased or insane, provide for his own unfortunate. The way out of misery of all kinds is the same straight and narrow way of personal effort—a way long and hard to travel—but sure to lead to the goal in the end. These terrible ills of human life are providential; they are incidental to human progress, and are unavailable at the present stage of society. Their removal must be very gradual, very slow, very tedious, but time and patience will cure them all if scope be given to the curative processes. In the meantime Mr. George Peabody, in attempting to anticipate the regular working out of the social problem by his munificent gifts, is only creating confusion. He is answering questions before they are asked, laying out roads in advance of travel, building houses in excess of population, providing for wants that are not felt, and so teasing people with the notion that they have got much further along than they have. He diverts his fortune from its proper ends, supplies an article for which there is no demand, and deprives people of the opportunity for supplying themselves with another for which there is great demand, namely, the satisfaction of earning all they possess. When the mechanics of New York feel the need of better lodging houses, they will build them, pay for them out of their wages and profits and enjoy them as possessions, which they are fairly entitled to hold. Mr. Stewart in providing such tenelements in advance is guilty at once of a folly and an impertinence, for he gives up so much of his own personal interest in his property, and he is interfering with the mechanic's right to say when, where and how his dwelling shall be built. He is crossing that iron track over which the car of progress must pass on its way to a better future. From such an act of imprudent generosity all men must be the sufferers, but none will be such deep and long sufferers as the class he aims to benefit.

Ezra Cornell, Matthew Vassar, Stephen Girard, and Peter Cooper are not to be reckoned, therefore, among the rational benefactors of their kind, but rather among the amiable mischief-makers of their generation, men who, with the very best intentions, cheat their fellow men of the inestimable privilege of their individuality and rob them of the priceless boon of moral experience.

I beg you, my friends, to bear in mind that I have not been thus far giving an exposition of my own views, but have been stating as well as I could the opinions held by some most intelligent, thoughtful and excellent people, whose views I respect, even when I here and there differ from them. I beg you particularly to bear this in mind, for if you do not you will get no intelligent idea of my purpose. I understand that last Sunday some of my hearers went away greatly distressed because I abused Garibaldi, Mazzini, John Bright and Charles Sumner, when, if they had listened intelligently, they would have perceived that I was only describing a class of people who did abuse these noble men; people whom I, so far from commending, was bent on refuting and visiting with my uttermost condemnation. My friends accused me, in the face of all my well-known convictions, of advocating opinions which I was doing my best to satirize and expose.

I say, let this mistake not be made to-day, for it is hard enough to meet the arguments of my adversaries, without having to look after the misconceptions of my friends.

I have been, you understand, stating a doctrine not my own. I have endeavored to state it as fairly and clearly as my time would allow. I have wished to represent it favorably, as why indeed should I not? The doctrine is an honest doctrine, honestly held by able and honest men. Its advocates are as amiable, kind, honorable, high-minded and humane as any members of the community. It is in the interest of humanity that they urge their opinion, believing very heartily that the individual and social welfare of mankind will, on the whole, and in the long run, be best served by this let-alone policy.

Nor do I mean here to urge objections to the doctrine on a philosophical ground, though such objections occur to me. My purpose is to take the opinion as it stands and carry it out further to some of its consequences, not thereby showing its falsity, but thereby exhibiting more fully its drift.

The doctrine is that each person must live for himself, since in that way he will most effectually live for others; that each person must look after his own interest, he being interested in his own interest more than any one else, and in his own interest representing one special portion of the general interest in which the social well-being is involved. I will accept the statement.

Self! Self-interest, self-regard, self-love, self! But what is this self? It seems a very simple thing to come at, but on analysis it is a very complicated thing. If our self were only our body, and self-interest only the physical pain or pleasure which the body experiences, if self-interest were fairly represented by the amount of comforts we could collect about us, the sum of wealth, or luxury, or privilege we could amass, the release from care or trouble we could succeed in effecting, then the policy of self-love would be obvious, and the method by which the policy would be pursued would be clear in that case too. The pursuance of the policy would be accompanied by no painful or troublesome sensations about the heart. We might go on playing our part in the strange drama of existence, and leaving others to play theirs comfortably, in the belief that the universal laws would bring every thing out squarely in the end. But into this conception of self so many elements enter! Pain and pleasure enter into it largely, very largely, but who shall tell all that is meant by those words, pain and pleasure? No physical experiences exhaust the sense of these words. All the finest sensibilities of the heart and the moral being have a share in their definition. Say "pleasure," and you suggest not merely a titillation of the nerves, but a thrill of the affections, a quiver of the heart-strings, a glow all over the sentient being, a sensation of the mind running all the way from a momentary gush of gladness to an abiding feeling of joy. Say "pain," and you suggest a hundred disagreeable emotions, from a prick on the skin to an agony of the soul. Say "happiness," and your thought runs from the delight of lying on the grass on a summer's day to the bliss of heaven.

Self-love is the rational love of all this self-hood. Self-interest is the rational regard for all these various and complex elements of personal good. To live for one's self alone—for one's own comfort, for one's own peace—simply and singly, is, unless one be a strangely undeveloped creature in all that makes the peculiar charm and glory of humanity, to live, not in a basement flat, on a level with the common sidewalk, but on four or five floors of moral experience. It is to have a whole house to one's self, with views in every direction and an observatory on the top.

If the condition of other people did not hurt me, I could leave that condition as it is and trouble myself never a moment about it; but it does hurt me. It not only injures me, it makes me suffer; and, in order to be nappy, I must protect myself against it. If I could shut my eyes to that condition, or shut my ears to it, or shut my heart to it, it would be very well; but I cannot. People are ignorant; their ignorance is forced upon my attention; I see the mistakes their ignorance leads them into, the fearful blunders and crimes it makes them commit, the vices it allows them to indulge in, the misery, ruin and death it subjects them to; I see how it shuts them out from privilege, bars them from opportunity, limits their range of activity, and keeps them down in the region of the animal. Now say that this is no concern of mine; that I am not responsible for it, that their disabilities and miseries are their own, then it is their misfortune to be ignorant, and the natural laws must look out for it. Still it so happens that I suffer; their stupidity hurts me, and, however little I may care about them, as one who cares supremely about himself, I must try to do something to protect my own private peace from this disturbing element. Whether what I do will be of any great service to the ignorant, may be doubtful, perhaps it will be of no service whatever; it may injure them; I cannot stop to think of that: I am seeking my own private content; I am acting in self defence, and thus acting, I contribute towards the printing of new papers, the publication of books and magazines, the distribution of documents, the endowment of colleges and the support of common schools; I give something to Freedmen's Aid Associations, something to ragged schools, something to lecturers and preachers. My self-love will not let me rest unless I do it. There may be those who are not thus afflicted, who are themselves perfectly happy in spite of the ignorance and brutish stupidity of men about them. To such I have nothing at present to say; but some of us are not happy. We might be if we could get rid of these troubles and sensibilities, but it would be very hard to do that, and even if we could do it, we should hardly feel justified in doing it, seeing that these sensibilities are the most beautiful and attractive part of our nature. We therefore make ourselves happier by trying to remove the ignorance that prevails.

The same course of reasoning is gone through in view of poverty, suffering, sorrow, vice and crime. So far as the poor man's poverty is his own affair, I may disclaim the duty and the title to meddle with it; he must deal with it as he can, bear it or be borne down by it, live through it or die under it, resign himself to it, and so sink into its mire deeper, or struggle with it, and so get patience, discipline and strength of character. Whatever its issue for him, I may calmly face the fact, for it is his issue, not mine; his experience, not mine; his fate, not mine; and the power which decreed his fate will no doubt help him through his battle with it. If this battle of his were only not fought on my door steps; in the street which I daily traverse; in the square which I must cross on the way to my business; in the passage-way of my store! If the garments which the conflict has torn to rags, and the faces it has scarred, and the forms it has bent and mutilated, and stunted, and disfigured, and the natures it has brutalized, were only not thrust against my senses all the time! But they are; and the best way to deprive them of their offensiveness seems to be to modify, if possible, the material conditions which beget and perpetuate poverty. I therefore, purely in my own interest we might say, endeavor to provide employment for the poor within my reach,—take them, so far as I can, away from their sickly dwellings; use my means to instruct them in cleanliness, temperance, and the economies of domestic life; aid the societies that are formed for the purpose of taking the children of poor parents from the crowded city and distributing them in the country among the farmers, where they will be usefully employed and put in the way of prospering. To do this makes me happier. I would do it wisely, of course; I would do it in the best way; I would consult, as far as I could, the welfare of the poor themselves; I would not hurt them by promiscuous alms-giving, or pamper them by indiscriminate charity, or destroy what remains of their self-respect by making them dependent on my bounty; I would have some conscience about the matter, and would not injure them any more than I could not help; still, loving myself first and foremost, and constituted as I am, I must indulge myself in some slight interference with them in order to secure peaceful days and quiet nights; and if this may be secured by a moderate investment of money, or time, or exertion, or influence, it is more economical to make the investment.

The miserable may be succored in their misery, and helped out of their misery by powers vastly superior to any that I can exert—powers within themselves,—and it might be much better for them if these powers were left to do their beneficent office, without human interference. My sympathy may do them no good; it may possibly make them weaker instead of stronger—more helpless instead of more self-reliant. My compassion towards them may result rather in bane than in blessing; I cannot tell; I have often suspected it to be so. Sometimes I have felt sure that it was so; but it is asking of me a great deal of self-denial to demand that I shall behold the suffering and sorrow of my friends, and shall make no effort to relieve myself of its troublesome presence by clearing them up. Why should I sacrifice my peace of mind to theirs? Why should I forbear to obtain such comfort as I can out of consideration for their heart's ease? I would not weaken or sadden them more than may be necessary for my own composure; but as a consistent lover of my own composure it cannot be expected that I will consent to suffer from the presence of an evil which I can do something, even in an artificial and in a somewhat illegitimate way, to remove.

On the same principle I shall make great efforts to diminish and reduce the causes of crime; to effect changes in the condition of society which shall make it easier for people to grow up virtuous, honest, temperate, peaceful, orderly, industrious. The drunkards are an offence to me; the harlots are a nuisance; the thieves are a disturbance, and the pickpockets a pest. I cannot sleep for the burglars, nor walk at night in the outskirts of the town for fear of a slung-shot. If these people would let me alone, I should be very willing to let them alone. If the incendiary would confine his sparks to my neighbor's woodpile, and the house-breaker would limit his curiosity to the construction of my friend's key-hole! But I am in terror. It is true that now and then one of these wicked gentry gets caught and hanged; but their catching is difficult and their hanging uncertain. The number of the vermin destroyed is very inconsiderable, and makes no impression on the multitude that remain. The jail, the penitentiary and the gallows afford me but a partial and precarious content; the State prison gives me but a small sense of security. I am unhappy in spite of the public executioner, and so I lay out plans for self-protection by building Farm Schools and Reform Schools and Inebriate Asylums; by opening gymnasiums, libraries and galleries; then doing all I can to prevent the mischief I cannot punish. It is hard work, no doubt; it costs money; it costs time and thought, but, on the whole, I suffer less by giving the money, and time, and thought, than by bearing the evil. If my preventive measures benefit the criminal classes, I am very glad of it; but whether they do or not, they will perhaps be for my own personal benefit, and that is the paramount consideration.

Thus, on the principle of self-love pure and simple, we are led, we will not say to beneficence, for beneficence is the doing of good, and it is still a question whether any good is done; we will not say to benevolence, for benevolence is the willing or purposing of good, and no good may be willed or purposed except to ourselves; but, we will say, to interfere with other people's affairs, and to effort at altering the conditions under which other people exist. Self-interest involves interest in others; self-regard involves regard for others; self-preservation involves the preservation of others. Even on the lowest plane of selfishness we must do a great deal to effect changes in the world we live in. On the higher plane of self-love we must be working in some way incessantly to effect changes in the world we live in. As our self-love becomes intelligent, our endeavors become deliberate; as our self-love becomes deep, our endeavors become earnest. The law of self-interest becomes the law of social activity, and in loving ourselves we are compelled to love everybody else.

What nobler duty than the cultivation of a worthy self-love? A worthy self-love; only a worthy self-love is self-love at all. The people who make profession of loving themselves supremely, and being indifferent to all but themselves, are people who hate themselves, for they love themselves as animals; and for a man to love himself as an animal is to hate himself, to despise and scorn himself. The love he bears himself is a love that bestializes, rots and ruins. Such a love is an inverted self-sacrifice. It is saintliness turned upside down. It is immolation of the better self to the worse. It is seeking one's eternal blessedness in hell. It is aspiring towards the brute. To love one's self as a rational human being; to love one's rationality—one's humanity; to love one's own truthfulness, dignity, and honor; to love one's own pure loveliness, is to love nothing limited or individual; it is to love something universal and eternal; it is to love nothing less than the God who made him.

The Congressional Library at Washington is the largest in the country, containing about 206,000 volumes. Next to it stands the Public Library of Boston, with its 179,250 volumes. This institution is so complete in its appointments and admirable in its management that it may almost be regarded as a model institution. This is one reason of its popularity and rapid growth. Every Bostonian feels a wholesome pride in the institution, and last year over six hundred individuals presented it with books. Mr. George Ticknor alone gave over eight thousand volumes to this collection. In fact it is now considered an exceedingly ill-mannered thing for a Boston gentleman to die without leaving either books or money to the Public Library, as to leave a bequest to Harvard College was formerly a part of a Boston merchant's religion. This is the way to build up an institution. Any town in the country can have a creditable library in twenty years by working for it in this wise way. New York has no Public Library; but it has Tammany Hall, which accounts for the deprivation. The difference between the two is that the former is an institution and the latter a destitution.—Golden Age.

"I have the reading of it every week." It not unfrequently occurs, when persons are asked if they will subscribe for a newspaper, or if they already take it, that they reply—"No, but neighbor B. takes it, and I have the reading of it every week." Such often add, "I consider it the best paper I know of." They are benefited every week by the toils, perplexities, and expenditures of those who receive nothing from them in return. Reader! if you feel reprieved, just send in your name and take the paper yourself.—Exchange.

THE RESULTS OF REPRESSIVE EDUCATION.

[From Stilling's "Theobald, or the Fanatic," chapter V.]

In the midst of scenes of this character it was, that Samuel Jehosaphat Theobald first saw the light and passed his childhood and youth. Diedrich Theobald and his wife Amelia, by birth the Mademoiselle Van Wirthen, lived well-contented and happy on their large farm; everything proceeded according to their wishes, and Amelia acquitted herself in her new sphere as well as farmer's wives in general. She had completely laid aside her nobility to live in the kitchen and to serve God and her husband according to her own views, with all her heart. In the second year after her marriage she bore her husband the son above named, and at his baptism gave him that uncommon Jewish name. As his parents had determined to educate him in a strictly religious manner, and to make something extraordinary of him, they acted in imitation of the devoted Hannah of old, by dedicating him to the Lord from his cradle. When he was scarcely six years old, he was sent to Berlenburg to school, where he was committed to the care of his friends.

If any one will reflect on the circumstances, he may easily imagine what sort of education it must have been. Many of the details, however, are so singular that it may be well worth our time and labor to present them with some degree of minuteness.

Tuchfelt, the deposed clergyman noticed above, was the only person whom they judged competent to be entrusted with the important charge. He received him into his family at an early age. Theobald selected him in particular on account of his extreme austerity of manners, and his high reputation for sanctity. The physical training which Samuel was compelled to undergo was to sleep as little as possible, to retire precisely at nine in the evening, to rise at four in the morning, to breakfast at seven, to take a very frugal meal at dinner, to sup on simple bread and butter with a glass of fresh water, and never to taste a morsel between meals. This was his uniform mode of life. His moral training was, if possible, still more severe. He was strictly excluded from all intercourse with other children; every word he spoke was first to be weighed in a golden balance, and every fault according to its nature was to be punished with more or less severity with the rod. Tuchfelt assumed the whole charge of his education personally; he instructed him in Latin and Greek and Hebrew, and required him to live perpetually in a praying frame of mind.

It is scarcely possible to describe the effect of this singular discipline; he became exceedingly mild and obedient. His will seemed to be entirely broken, so that at last he came to will nothing but what others willed for him. His whole appearance resembled more the innocence and purity of an angel than that of a mortal. By nature he was an uncommonly handsome child; and as all his passions had been kept under constant restraint, and indeed reined in, as it were, with a strong curb, not the slightest trace of an unlovely feature was perceptible in his whole countenance,—every feature wore a meek, innocent simplicity, and a soft, indescribable sweetness.

His parents in their visits to Berlenburg were so enraptured with their son, that they now began to indulge the fond anticipation of his becoming an important instrument in the hands of God in promoting the great designs of his kingdom. They often expressed the desire to take him home with them, to enjoy more of his company; but Tuchfelt would by no means consent. He used to say—"That my Samuel is not yet quite strong enough to bear the corruptions of the world." So thought his parents, and were content to deny themselves the pleasure.

It happened one afternoon, that Tuchfelt and his lady were invited to tea with the count in the castle, when Samuel was entrusted during his absence to the care of his son, who, not supposing it necessary to be so strict as to prohibit him from going out, went away himself, and left Samuel alone. The boy went out into the yard, where he chanced to spy through the fence one of his neighbor's children, a little girl playing with her doll. As soon as she saw Samuel, she made a threatening gesture toward him as children will do; being extremely timid from the peculiar nature of his moral training, he started back with fear, and stood at some distance from the fence. This is just what the little girl did not wish. She therefore came up to the fence, and sticking through a large piece of apple, said—"Here, boy, eat."

Samuel, feeling somewhat conscience-stricken for being in the yard without permission, and against the express orders of his teacher, gazed at her with his clear black eyes, and, calling to mind the circumstance of Adam and the apple, he exclaimed—"No, Eve, no; I will not touch it."

Lisetta stared with open mouth, and said—"Why do you call me Eve? My name is not Eve, it is Lisetta. Here, take it; it is clean."

"Yes, but you know Adam committed a great sin by eating the apple which Eve gave him."

"Oh, you simpleton, ma often gives pa a piece of apple, and it is no sin. Pa says, that God makes apples grow that we may eat them and be thankful."

"Yes, but between meals; between meals it is not right to eat."

"You foolish boy, our cat often eats mice between meals, and she does not commit a sin. Here, take it."

"No, I dare not—but if nobody saw me, I would."

Lisetta looked round at all the windows, and Samuel likewise; when he saw no one, he ate the apple, and it tasted excellently,

It is a common remark, but one not sufficiently pondered, that when once the first step of transgression is taken, return is more difficult. Sin tastes sweet; it is so agreeable to the lips and tempting to the palate, that the poison is swallowed at full draught without thought of its consequences. To venture is to embrace. Let my youthful readers carefully treasure the reflection, and let them fly from its alluring image, as it shines at a distance.

It happened thus with Samuel. He ventured on the first temptation; the apple tasted better than he imagined; he wished for another piece.

"Come over here and get it," said Lisetta.

"I cannot," shouted Samuel, with his clear, strong voice. He ran up and down along the fence. Near the house stood a large horse block; he was on it in an instant, and over the fence beside Lisetta.

This was the first indulgence he ever enjoyed; never before had he tasted the attractive sweets of freedom; he was so full of life and happiness, that he jumped, and tumbled, and shouted for joy. Lisetta, as may be supposed, enjoyed herself equally well. She was also strictly educated, though not in so high a degree as Samuel. Happiness beamed in their very countenances; they caressed, and played, and talked, to their full satisfaction, and without doing anything mischievous or reprehensible. Had the pious Tuchfelt suffered his pupil to play with orderly children under his own eye a few hours each day, he never would have taken that forbidden step during that afternoon, nor experienced those sad consequences which followed. Meanwhile hours flew away like minutes, and Tuchfelt returned before Samuel thought of home. As soon as he entered the house, he inquired for Samuel; they informed him that he had been in the house a short time since, but could give no account of him, and at last he was found with Lisetta.

Tuchfelt did not regard his disobedience as a great transgression, for he was too ignorant of human nature to be fully aware of the consequences which that step, in connection with his peculiar discipline, must have upon the boy. Had he been capable of a mere suspicion, he would have adopted an entirely different mode of education. He did nothing farther than to present in an impressive manner his sin of disobedience, and the sin of wasting his precious time. All this Samuel felt and acknowledged, but he felt so little sorrow for it that he now constantly longed for another opportunity of playing with Lisetta. From that time forward, his mind was filled with nothing else but with thoughts of Lisetta.

A very noticeable thing about this disaster is graphic accounts of it which one and another of the survivors have given. Every reporter and other person engaged in the corruption of the English language, and desirous of having his week's wages raised for doing his work better, should cut out Mr. Charles Story's account, for instance, and keep it by him as a model. Here is a specimen of it:

"A moment after I saw a woman lying upon the grass, her right arm fearfully crushed between the elbow and shoulder, and her face badly scalded. She must have been suffering intense pain. I asked her what I could do for her. She replied: 'There are others hurt a great deal worse than I am. Go and attend to them. I can bear it.' She was taken to a house near by, and laid upon the floor, with a bundle of bloody clothes for a pillow. She would not let the doctor attend to her injuries until she knew that the others had been seen to. There were several others badly hurt in the same house. After the train had been thoroughly cleared, I got my wife and little girl a place to stay, and got on a Lynn horse-car. I went to Lynn and spread the news, and a train was sent up."

Not that some of the reporters also did not do well. But they still have among them the writer who, the other day, spoke of Mayor Hall's truckling to the mob as "Mayor Hall's truculency"—which latter would have been almost a subject for Nast.—Nation.

The despotism of sectarian feeling, especially over the tender and sacred affections of the soul, was painfully illustrated a couple of weeks ago. A young Jewess of Baltimore, named Miss Bettie Jacobs, eloped on the 19th inst. with a Gentile named Allman. The fugitives were married at Washington, and proceeded to Alexandria for a quiet honeymoon. The father traced them up to the hotel, and was conducted up to their room. As the door was opened, the bride exclaimed: "Father, we are legally married," and burst into tears. The father upbraided her for her act, and forbade her to call him father again, as she had disgraced both him and her mother. A dialogue was carried on between the two amid their cries and sobs, which was only interrupted when the landlord declared that it was attracting too much attention, and must cease. The father turned to go, and as he did so cast a fond look at his daughter, and to her frantic "Good-by, father," said: "I will go home, put crape on my hat, and mark you on the record: 'Died September 19, 1871.' And thus they separated.—Revolution."

RICHES.—"I cannot call riches better than the baggage of virtue; the Roman word is better, impedimenta; for as the baggage is to an army, so is riches to virtue; it cannot be spared nor left behind, but it hindereth the march; yea, and the care of it sometimes loseth or disturbeth the victory. Of great riches there is no real use, except it be in the distribution; the rest is but conceit."—Bacon.

Voices from the People.

"I like THE INDEX more and more, although I find much in it that I do not agree with. I do not hold so high an opinion of science as you do. Perhaps it is because I am so ignorant. Can science add anything to the color or fragrance of the rose? Is not the flower cultivated by the most ignorant as sweet and beautiful as if tended by the wisest philosopher? Can anything improve the whiteness and purity of the pond lily? When I see one of those beautiful flowers floating on the surface of the stagnant pool, transforming the filth and slime at the bottom of the same into such wondrous beauty and purity, I think I see a deity enthroned there that defies all the skill and science of all the sages to improve upon or imitate. Can science explain to the common understanding the formation of a single leaf or blade of grass? Well, I suppose you will say, 'all that ails me is that I don't know much. I think just so myself; and I think it is a very common ailment among people of my acquaintance. Of course you don't care who or what I am, but I am going to tell you: I am one of those poor, forsaken creatures, called a gross widow. But it may soften the case a little if I tell you (what is perfectly true) that my husband, after living with me twenty years, did the best and kindest thing he ever did for me by leaving me.'"

"Hurrah for THE INDEX, the exponent of a great and noble cause! Before me lies a copy of Aug. 5th, the first I have ever seen. INDEX, I welcome you! You are devoted to the very cause for the development of which I am at present, and have been for years laboring to establish a paper. My sole aim in life is, and (if my GOVERNOR spares me and gives me strength for that purpose) my life and all my earnings shall be devoted to the advancement of science and knowledge, Free Religion and enlightenment. I have not yet, however, and perhaps shall not for some time yet, come out. I am only waiting for strength to do a more telling work when I do begin. And now I welcome those who have the courage to start in the path which is pointed out to me. Gentlemen, I enclose $2.00 as a subscription to THE INDEX for a year, and hope by that time that my friendship for the paper may increase to several subscriptions. I wish also to subscribe one share of $100.00 to the capital stock of the Index Association, subject to the conditions announced, and hope in good time to increase the same materially."

"I want to send Mr. Potter's article on 'Southern Reconstruction' to General Armstrong at Hampton. He is a manly, broad, cultured man, and his scheme strikes every practical person as the very best plan for educating the blacks. I send you a copy of the report of the institution. Look over it, if you have time. Mr. Potter's article is capital. My wife and I enjoy THE INDEX immensely, and so does every body that I meet with; and all honest-minded, independent, thinking people must appreciate the broad, catholic, manly, and humane spirit in which the paper is conducted."

"I am much pleased with THE INDEX for the past two months, and think there is a decided improvement in it."

The Index.

NOVEMBER 4, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

For Special Notices see eighth page.

SUCCESS!

The Directors of the Index Association met in Toledo on Thursday evening, Oct. 26, to take the necessary steps consequent on the subscription of the first fifty thousand dollars of the company's stock. There were present Messrs. Butts, Macomber, Bissell, Cone, Bateson and Abbot. The stock-book was examined, and the full sum of fifty thousand dollars was found to have been subscribed. The first assessment of ten per cent. on each share was voted; and due notice of this fact will soon be sent to each share-holder, together with a printed report of the proceedings of the meeting.

At the same time the subscription-list, book accounts, bound volumes, tracts, unsold copies, and other property of THE INDEX, were transferred to the Association by the former proprietors of the paper, namely, Messrs. Macomber, Locke, Abbot, and Bateson. THE INDEX has thus become the lawful property of the new Index Association.

We congratulate our friends with a full heart on the brilliant success thus far achieved. The plan was declared impossible by nearly every one at the start. But the liberals of America have proved themselves in earnest, and done much to redeem liberalism itself from the reproach of torpidity and selfishness. To the subscribers whose names stand on the list opposite, we return our most grateful thanks. So far as this splendid result is an expression of personal confidence and good will, we hope that the future conduct of THE INDEX will prove us not unworthy of it. But we rejoice to see in it equally a public expression of appreciation of the high character and great ability of our editorial contributors, without whose aid, so freely and generously rendered, THE INDEX would never have been thus planted on a firm foundation. Who could lose heart or hope while such comrades stand by his side?

But while THE INDEX is thus assured for the future, both in its existence and its growth, it will not do to halt. The word is still—"Onward!" Fifty thousand dollars have been raised within six months; now for the hundred thousand! The second fifty can be raised at least as easily, we believe, as the first. It is but a question of time. Now that there is no alternative of possible failure to discourage them, the active friends of THE INDEX will work for its gradual upbuilding into an institution commensurate with the work to be done, and will take pride in its growth. It is only a nucleus to-day, but the nucleus of great things. There is an old yet true saying—"To him that hath it shall be given." It will prove true of THE INDEX. Let every friend of Free Religion help to make it so.

"But what are you going to do with your fifty thousand dollars, now that they are raised?"

This is a question that must be answered; and the answer is plain. The Directors should scrupulously and conscientiously devote every cent of the fifty thousand dollars towards fulfilling the promises originally made and carrying out the purposes for which the money is given.

THE INDEX was not a business speculation at the start, nor is it now. If it can be made a business success (and we believe it can), well and good; but the purpose avowed in our first Prospectus was to advocate Free Religion—not to make money, but to further a great cause. The fifty thousand dollars have been subscribed that we may have the means of fulfilling this purpose more completely. They practically constitute a trust-fund, and are to be used as such. The dissemination of liberal and ennobling ideas, the cultivation in society and in the individual of a higher, purer, and manlier spirit, the emancipation of the people from every form of spiritual slavery—these are the objects of the Index Association, to be secured, according to the terms of incorporation, by "publishing books, pamphlets, and other publications; also a weekly paper to be called THE INDEX, to be devoted to Free Religion." Hence it should be borne in mind that the purpose of the Association is one of a philanthropic rather than of a business character; while at the same time its affairs must be managed with economy, care, and good business sense. We believe that the Directors will within a few years be able to make the stock subscriptions a good investment for the shareholders. They are determined to comply strictly with the requirement not to incur debt—to assume no expense beyond the known means at their command. We believe that our friends may repose absolute confidence in their business sagacity and responsibility.

The improvements at present desired are these:

1. Enlargement of THE INDEX by doubling the number of its pages. A large proportion of its readers file their copies for binding; and it would injure the interests of the paper in many ways to make this impracticable by increasing the size of the pages. If any change is made in this respect, it should be made by adopting a smaller-sized page. But, until the Association can afford to employ an assistant editor at a salary high enough to secure a first-class one, it is judged best to wait. We could not alone edit the paper with proper care, if it were much larger; and we have no wish to secure quantity at the cost of quality. With editorial assistance of this kind, however, we could more than double the value and influence of the paper by doubling its size. There is need of a literary, a scientific, a family, and other departments; but we prefer to wait till we can make them of the highest possible character. With a capital of one hundred thousand dollars, we believe we could make the THE INDEX so valuable that no liberal person in the land could afford to do without it.
2. Employment of a first-class business manager who can give his entire time to the work of building up a great circulation, superintending the advertisement department, and so forth. The Association have already engaged a competent gentleman for this purpose who believes thoroughly in the great future of THE INDEX, and will do his best to lessen the interval between this future and the present time. We have entire confidence in his zeal, capacity, and energy.

3. Wide advertisement of THE INDEX in all the best papers of the country. A certain sum has already been appropriated for this purpose, though not sufficient to accomplish all that is desired. It has been judged best to be cautious in this matter, and to make sure that all the advertising done shall more than pay for itself. The money so generously confided to our use shall not be wasted in profitless or injudicious experiments.

4. The securing of contributions to THE INDEX from the ablest and best known writers of the world. A liberal sum, considering our resources, has been appropriated for this purpose; but it is too early yet to state with what success. We hope before the end of the year to be able to announce such names of contributors as will command at once the attention and support of the entire liberal portion of the country. In justice our present editorial contributors should be paid, and paid liberally, for the admirable work they do; and it will delight us if at some future time the Association shall find itself able to render them this merited recognition. But at present this is impossible without failing to redeem our promise of trying to secure the aid of some others we have in mind. We trust, however, that our readers appreciate the disinterested labors which have been so freely and perseveringly given to us in our efforts to establish THE INDEX. It is an assistance that we shall remember most gratefully to our dying day.

5. The purchase of a printing establishment devoted exclusively to THE INDEX and our other publications. This would materially reduce our expenses, and enable us by degrees to build up a great publishing centre for liberal works of a high character. There is no establishment of this kind in the country; and there is nothing more plainly needed. For the present this plan is of course postponed; but our friends will see the great field that here invites us, and understand the sure advantages that would be gained by having the entire stock of the Association taken. Having in their own hands the best possible medium of advertising their own publications, the Association would thus be enabled to carry out their purposes more efficiently and at the same time make the shares pay handsome dividends in the end. Concentration of efforts and means in this manner would accomplish vast results for the liberal cause.

6. The establishment of branch offices in all the leading cities of the land. Immediate efforts will be made to establish one in New York and in other places as fast as practicable. This can probably be done at a very reasonable cost; and we should be glad to receive help in this matter from our friends in the large cities.

In a word, the Index Association are in earnest, and mean business. There are other plans on foot all tending in the same general direction; but no plan will be acted upon any farther or any faster than we have funds on hand to execute it. The need of the full hundred thousand dollars will now be manifest to every one, although we have already enough to ensure the perpetuity of THE INDEX. The point is here—the more money we have to work with, the more rapidly will THE INDEX grow, and the better will the cause it serves be promoted. Instead of flagging or resting complacently on our oars, let us all take hold with a will and push on the work we have begun.

Friends, cannot we raise the full hundred thousand dollars by the first of January? There are already determined and resolute spirits at work to secure this magnificent result. "Where there's a will, there's a way." We wait with hope and confidence. Who will help?

THE GOOD CAUSE.

To the workers in a new and unpopular cause it is always cheering to know that there are some at a distance who share their enthusiasm, cherish their aims, and carry on parallel lines of endeavor. A hasty run through some portions of the old world enables one to see further than he can at home along the reaches of that vast ocean of thought which, fed by the living springs of the human mind, beats against all coasts, and of which THE INDEX is one of the pushing waves. The brief weeks of a single summer are not sufficient for any adequate sounding of depths, or any exploration of bays and inlets. They are hardly enough for the most cursory glance at the distant gleaming of water. But where little is accurately known, much may be fairly inferred; and the inferences are favorable to the best auguries for rational religious thought.

The friends of the Free Religious Association, through the Annual Reports of the Secretary, and the speeches made at Conventions and printed in pamphlet form, have been made acquainted with the extensive movement in Germany, the new Protestant departure, which is purely rationalistic in character,—the liberal opinion in France, which has come to a nucleus in Paris and taken shape in a free society there,—the outbreak of radical protest in Italy, which in Milan and other cities contemplates a reconstruction of religion on the basis, not of Christianity, but of sentiment based on science. Of these it is unnecessary to speak here. It is in England that our idea is best understood, and finds its best illustration. It is not externally great there. It has built no cathedral, accumulated no treasures of wealth, entered into no formidable combinations against the Established Church, concerted no formidable attack on the great armies of Dissent. But it has firmly planted itself in strong vital soil, and in many places it has struck its roots into the living mind of the age.

Mr. Conway's society in London furnishes a good illustration of the tone and temper of Free Religion there. Mr. Conway has two chapels several miles apart, in which he preaches every Sunday on different parts of the day. The larger of the two is associated with the eloquent William Johnson Fox, whose radical ministry was famous thirty or forty years ago. This audience, more remarkable for quality than for quantity, but very remarkable for quality, is composed of people known and felt in the world of thought; people who are in a sense groups and communities of people, centres and nuclei of influence. The administration is of the simplest and most intellectual kind. The minimum of concession is granted to sentiment; no concession whatever is made to sentimentalism; and conventionality is discarded wholly. The noxious elements of superstitious opinion and affected piety are strained out of the hymns; a calm, lofty meditation takes the place of spoken prayer; the scripture lessons are selected from all accessible bibles,—the books of the Old and New Testaments, the Apocryphal writings, the sacred literatures of China, Persia, Egypt. Passages of select wisdom are culled from the great modern authors of Germany and England (a striking passage from Goethe was read, with impressive effect, in my hearing), thus accustoming the people to think of all wisdom as sacred, and to listen to all good words with reverence proportioned to their value and not their antiquity or their traditional origin. The establishment of the equal validity of all wisdom is of the utmost moment. It is one of the contemplated achievements of Free Religion. It is better to include all sacred literatures than to omit any on account of its popular misuse; and this hospitable practice of treating the best products of the human mind with the same deference goes farther towards dethroning particular affectations of sanctity than any studied neglect of popular idols.

Of the discourse it is unnecessary to speak. All will understand that it must be free from pulpit and Sabbath peculiarities, that in a word it must be rational and scientific,—an honest treatment of important themes from the highest point of intelligence.

Mr. Conway's society is the best type of the Liberal societies in England. The best minds among the Unitarians respect it and apparently conform to it far more than is done in this country, where religious thought is much less free from dogmatic trammels and the base spirit of sectarianism has more influence over cultivated people. Similar societies exist in other cities, and, were there fit preachers to lead and sustain them, several more would be established immediately.

One admirable feature in these organizations is their semi-secular character. Utility takes precedence of usage. Serviceable things are adopted, unserviceable things are discarded. The minister is not required to be more than a reasonably cultivated, honest, and earnest man, who dresses and conducts himself after the manner of other men of his class in society. He mingles poetry with the world,—has acquaintances among people of all conditions, is interested in science, art, politics, reform, and more or less incidentally, according to capacity and taste, shares in the common interests of his fellow-men. He writes for the magazines and newspapers, by such literary labors in considerable part supporting himself and his family. The functions of the priesthood are dropped. The drudgery of the old-fashioned pastorate is dispensed with; and the teaching of religion is simply put on the same footing with other kinds of teaching. This is an inestimable advantage; for it takes away the glamour that has hitherto surrounded the religious teacher, and has hung about religion itself an impenetrable veil of mystery. The substitution of cultivated intelligence in the place of priestly authority and clerical impertinence and prophetic arrogance places the institution of religion on a new footing entirely, invites sympathy between the religious and the secular departments of the mind, and throws open the consecrated precincts to the familiar tread of ordinary intelligence.

A change of this sort is going on in America, and is encouraged by ministers who little suspect what they are doing. They hope to win the world by a compliance with a few unimportant externals. They are really breaking down the wall between the sacred and the secular, and bringing the mysteries of their order under the disintegrating action of the keen practical mind which only waits to extend its sway over the exclusive domains of the Church. Free Religion rejoices in this disintegration, for until it has taken place rational religion will be impossible; and Free Religion and Rational Religion are one and the same thing.

O. B. F.

A UNIVERSAL BIBLE.

It would be a great convenience to many public teachers of religion, if the best portions of the so-called sacred books of all religions were to be selected and bound together in a single volume. The time seems to have passed when such a collection of writings could draw to them any superstitious regard or could come to be considered as setting up a new standard of spiritual authority; while, on the other hand, the very placing together, side by side, of the most spiritual utterances of all religions would be a great help in overthrowing the exclusive and arrogant claims of specific faiths and would set an excellent lesson in spiritual freedom and fellowship. Not a few religious teachers are now accustomed in their Sunday services to read from other books than those found in the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures; and though of course they would not feel bound to confine themselves to any general collection that might be made, they would yet often find such a collection a great accommodation. But to many other people, whose thought is ready for such a spiritual anthology but who have no access even through translations to any bibles except the Hebrew and Christian, a work of this kind, well done by a competent scholar, would be a still greater boon. It would be one of the best propagandist books that could be circulated in behalf of free and rational religion.

And it seems very probable, too, that the Christian Bible would get a more appreciative reading than it now gets, if its finer portions were thus brought into a Universal Bible, separated from the great amount of unprofitable reading—unprofitable for moral or spiritual stimulus—with which they are now connected. The popular idea that the whole Bible is the word of God and that it is of equal inspiration and authority throughout, is fatal to any real appreciation of the majesty and beauty of some of its parts. A rationalistic interpretation, sifting the book as it would any other by the test of literary and moral merit, is in fact the best revealer of the genuine worth that is contained in the Bible. The preacher who has read to a popular audience the book of Job, in Dr. Noyes' version, taking it in connected portions according to the natural divisions of the form (for a form it is) and not according to the chapters in the common translation, and commenting upon it from a rationalistic standpoint as he would in a similar reading of Faust, has discovered what a new revelation the book is to the minds of his hearers. Where they had been accustomed to look only for a technical kind of religious instruction, they find, under this new treatment, a profound philosophy and an intellectual and moral grandeur which invest the book with as fresh a charm as if it had just been issued from the printing press. It is strange, indeed, how ignorant the masses of Christian people are of the real spiritual and literary beauty that is in the Bible. Strange, seeing that the reading of it is taught as a religious duty; and yet not strange when one reflects that the common way of reading the book through in order, or of reading it piecemeal, a chapter at a time, as a daily talisman, must naturally destroy its vitality. To take out its best parts, to remove them from beneath the "sacred" covers where they have only been received as the limbs of an idol or repeated as an oracle of traditional inspiration, and to place them in a natural position alongside of the corresponding utterances of other faiths, would be to reveal their true life and value to many old readers.

Nor would such a collection shock the religious sentiment of the people so much, probably, as it would that of the clergy as a class;—for the reason that among the people the religious sentiment is nearer to that primitive condition of faith out of which the great utterances of all the ancient faiths proceeded, while among the clergy it has been subjected to more artificial, ecclesiastical culture and become habituated more to conventional forms. Indeed, many of the spiritual passages of the ancient heathen religions might be inserted in chapters of the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures, and the harmony of sentiment would be so perfect that an ordinary audience would not discover the interpolation if the preacher should not tell them. Take, for instance, these verses which Max Mueller translates from the Vedas, and which would seem to us in their natural place, if we should find them in the Hebrew Psalms:

"Who is the God to whom we shall offer our sacrifice?—He through whom the sky is bright and the earth firm; He through whom the heaven was established,—nay, the highest heaven; He who measured out the light in the air.

"Who is the God to whom we shall offer our sacrifice?—He to whom heaven and earth, standing firm by his will, look up, trembling inwardly; He who alone is God above all gods."

Or if the congregation in an Episcopal church should, some Sunday morning, find the following sentences in their Litany, would they seem very much out of place, provided only that Jehovah, or Lord, were substituted for the Hindu name of Deity, Varuna?

"Let me not yet, O Varuna, enter into the house of clay; have mercy, Almighty, have mercy!

"If I go along trembling, like a cloud driven by the wind; have mercy, Almighty, have mercy!

"Through want of strength, thou strong and bright Deity, have I gone wrong; have mercy, Almighty; have mercy!

"Thirst came upon the worshipper, though he stood in the midst of the waters; have mercy, Almighty, have mercy!"

It were well, too, to accustom our ears to other names of Deity than those most familiar in Christendom. Prof. Mueller well says: "We should surely not allow the strange name of Varuna to jar on our ears, but should remember that it is but one of many names which men invented in their helplessness to express their ideas of the Deity, however partial and imperfect." Why may not Varuna be as good a name as Jehovah or God to apply to a Power that no name can adequately define?

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

In my prairie wanderings, I do not see THE INDEX every week, and so do not always know your points of attack. The last I saw was a charge on the missionary operations of the church in "heathen nations." You could not have opened on a more important fortress. There never was a grander, grosser imposition practised on an unsuspecting world than is now carried on by what styles itself the "American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions"—sometimes written, for short, the A. B. C. F. M.

The abolitionists, in their war of thirty years on American Slavery, had occasion many times to take it in hand and expose its complicity, not only with slavery at home, but with polygamy in Mahometan and Pagan countries.

We first called the Board to account as far back as 1835, or earlier, at the time of the great religious awakening in the Sandwich Islands. Some of the missionaries at that time, more alive to the sins and crimes of the slave system than the Board itself, or the churches and clergy they had left at home, wrote and published a tract, powerfully appealing to the religious sentiment of the country to put away that great evil, not only as a reproach to the Christian religion generally, but as a positive and mighty hindrance to the spread of it among the heathen.

The tract was printed on the mission press then established on one of the Islands, and sent to be distributed among the American churches. But the Board suppressed it forthwith, one of the Boston secretaries giving as a reason that "its general circulation would ruin the cause of missions!"

At the next annual meeting, the Board passed a resolution prohibiting its missionaries from printing or publishing any matter for American reading or circulation, until it had passed under the supervision and received the approval of the authorities representing the Board at home. So were the slave power at the South and its no less guilty accomplices in Northern churches and pulpits always consulted, always conciliated, if possible.

John Leighton Wilson was a missionary of this A. B. C. F. M. to the heathen in Africa, while owning and helping to make Africans heathen, not less degraded and debased, at home. The Board endeavored to gloss over his shame, when the abolitionists exposed him and it to the gaze of day, but made matters only worse.

I wish Mr. Charles K. Whipple would write you two or three brief articles on the Indian Missions of the Board; particularly the Choctaw and Cherokee Indian Missions. He could astonish your readers all they could bear and live, without in any instance transcending the facts.

The Board's missionaries connived at polygamy too, as well as slavery, among the Indians, as well as among the Mahometans in foreign lands, the official instructions to the missionaries being to this purport, namely:—

"That it is the business of the Board and its missionaries to prosecute the work of saving souls without interfering with the civil condition of society, any farther than the consciences of the people become enlightened."

Who was to "enlighten the conscience" of our Indian tribes, the Board did not state. Perhaps they commit that unimportant part of the business to the Indian agents, and other enlightening, civilizing influences the government is always sending among them. We know well what auxiliaries these always are in the work of evangelization, with their rum, gunpowder, bullets, knives and other like toys and trinkets that the Indians value so highly!

I hope you will pursue this missionary subject, so well begun in the last INDEX I saw, as its importance warrants. Were I among my books and records, you should have all the aid in my power to supply. The church, the clergy rather, are placing great reliance on missionary operations and Young Men's Christian Associations to extend and perpetuate their power and reign over the people. And yet I know from actual contact with the former, and close, careful study of the latter, that two sublimer impositions were never palmed off on a blind and bewildered age.

P. P.

[We shall be very glad to receive the articles above suggested from Mr. Whipple, who is doing most efficient service to the liberal cause in many ways, as is shown by the new series of tracts he advertises on our last page this week. Orders for these tracts should be sent directly to him.—ED.]

Two or three months ago the Chicago Times had the following jocose paragraph on the Index Association plan:—

"Toledo wishes to have a free religious paper, and hopes to obtain voluntary subscriptions to $100,000 worth of stock in her attempt at eleemosynary piety. It won't work. If there is anything that cannot be had in modern days without money and without price, it is the word of the Lord. Ten thousand dollar ministerial salaries, $200,000 churches, and pews at a rental that would serve to furnish a dozen poor families with tenement homes, are the adjuncts of nineteenth century Christianity. Toledo's attempt to show up the glories of the pearl of great price through the medium of gratuitous journalism will ignominiously fail, and the projectors of the enterprise be driven to the more practical task of starting a corner on wheat."

The Times evidently mis-conceived both the kind of "freedom" and the kind of "religion" concerned in the matter. It supposed we hoped to dish out orthodox charity-soup gratis. Having a better purpose in view, we refer the Times to the first column of our fourth page for comments on the above.

Is not man a part of Nature? Then in Nature itself must be found the root of the moral and intellectual, as well as physical, elements of his being. When chemistry and physics shall be made to explain an act of self-sacrificing virtue, materialism will have found its proof; but not before.

THE EXAMINER.—Send $1.00 to Edward C. Towne, Winnetka, Ill., for the five numbers published of THE EXAMINER, 520 octavo pages. By its temporary suspension THE EXAMINER escaped the Great Fire. Not even a single back number was lost. Zion's Herald says:—"The boldest heretic of to-day." The Independent says:—"The most pronounced Radical in the land." The Chicago Advance:—"Filled with readable matter." The Boston Congregationalist:—"At the very front of the religious discussions of the day." The N. Y. Tribune:—"Would have given distinction to the writer in the field of elegant letters." The Chicago Tribune:—"There can be no denial of the fact of its ability and courage." The Chicago Post:—"Equal to the utterances of Theodore Parker." The five numbers sent post-paid for $1.00.

PROVIDENCE AND CHICAGO.

BUFFALO, N. Y., 262 Carolina St., Oct. 16, 1871.

FRIEND ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—For the sake of reason, common sense and humanity, and the reputation and honor of God, will you write an editorial for your INDEX on the absurd orthodox notion "that God, in his providence, burnt Chicago?" No less than half a dozen prominent divines of this place preached last Sunday evening on the Chicago calamity. They all could see the finger of God in it, and warned their hearers to heed such providences. Some declared this calamity to be brought on by the terrible wickedness of Chicago; that the Almighty used severe means to punish, but out of this punishment he would bring great good. One divine's text was—"Is there evil in the city and the Lord hath not done it?" I ask, Friend Abbot, is it possible that God Almighty would burn innocent children, feeble old men and women, and even women in the throes of child-birth, besides scorching, bruising and maiming thousands of other innocent human beings, because a few people in Chicago were desperately wicked? Friend Abbot, please give us a good article on this subject, and oblige

T. H. CALLAHAN.

[Mr. Potter's admirable editorial contribution in last week's INDEX is the best possible article on this subject.—ED.]

A DEFENCE OF SPIRITUALISM.

MR. ABBOT:—

Mr. Morris Einstein has well written—"Spiritualism in more than one respect is a curious phenomenon." Among the curiosities it has incidentally brought to light is a class of thinkers of which Mr. Einstein may be said to be the representative, and which exhibits a materialism so coldly suspicious of human honesty and human testimony that we may well suspect it of being a legitimate or illegitimate child of the old orthodox doctrine of the total depravity of the human race. It might well be supposed, after the searching investigation Spiritualism has undergone for the last twenty years, that its facts, at least, should be admitted to be genuine by every person of sufficient intelligence to write upon the subject.

Such is not the case, however, for here comes Mr. Einstein, and says it has "neither truth nor facts for its foundation!" Many thousands of his fellow-citizens, embracing minds of every capacity, have testified to the actual existence of these facts, or manifestations—have told us they have seen, heard and felt them—that they were extraordinary in their nature, and could not have been the result of any human exertion or contrivance; and yet Mr. Einstein speaks of them as "the miraculous feats that so-called mediums pretend to perform by the aid of spirits!" I have been investigating Spiritualism for the last twenty years, and in all that time have never seen a medium, nor heard of one before, who has asserted or "pretended" that he or she performed any miraculous feats at all, either by the aid of spirits or otherwise.

The truth is, Spiritualists do not believe in miracles. They believe and proclaim that, however strange or singular such manifestations may be, they must be the result of a natural cause, and come to us through the agency of some known or unknown natural law. Instead of mediums pretending to perform "miraculous feats," they always, so far as I know and believe, say they have no conscious agency in producing them at all, and that the spectator can judge of their source as well as they. Indeed, instances are numerous of mediums doubting their spiritual source, and being annoyed by the manifestations themselves, and endeavoring by all means to discourage their recurrence. Such especially is the case where the phenomena are of a boisterous or mischievous nature, such as occurred in the house of Rev. Mr. Phelps, of Stratford, Conn., some years since; or, as the newspapers inform us, such as have occurred lately in several different places in Ohio. Would it be unreasonable, then, to suppose Mr. Einstein's "smart man in Iowa" was one of those doubting mediums who found he could gain notoriety or money by playing Pharaoh's magician before a materialistic or orthodox audience? This was very likely the case.

Neither are all those manifestations confined to dark circles or dark rooms, as Mr. Einstein so confidently asserts. Very many, though not all, are witnessed in daylight, or in rooms artificially illuminated. After asserting that "these performances of mediums are all done in the dark," he proceeds to say that, "whenever light is suddenly let in, the medium is generally detected in the act of performing all these manifestations himself!" Then sometimes, it appears, light is suddenly let in and the medium is not performing the manifestations! Can Mr. Einstein tell who or what is? There were, of course, facts or manifestations which the "sceptics" attempted to detect the medium in performing, and he passed the ordeal scathless!

Is it not possible, then, that our friend may be mistaken about Spiritualism having no facts for its foundation? Really, materialism, like Spiritualism, is a very curious phenomenon. Hear its exponent. "Is not Spiritualism wanting all and every proof for its facts and truths?" While witnesses are within hearing of the scratch of his pen, he asks this question! And he proceeds thus:—"It [Spiritualism] must first of all prove the existence of spirits before it can assert the truths of Spiritualism."

What does he mean by the "truths of Spiritualism?" I know of no truth contended for by Spiritualists save the great truth that man exists as a living, sentient being after the body is resolved into its original elements, and to prove this they give us certain facts which they think cannot be accounted for otherwise than through the agency of disembodied spirits.

Ex-Senator Simmons, of Rhode Island, has told us he saw, with his physical eyes, in broad daylight, a pen that was not in contact with any human being, write his son's name, in his son's handwriting.

After the name was written and, as Mr. Simmons supposed, finished, the pen went slowly back and dotted the i! This was a scrupulousness, the Senator informs us, he had not thought about! Till then he supposed his son was living in California; but the intelligence that moved the pen informed him that he was dead, and when he died. This was afterwards verified.

The late Gov. Tallmadge, of this State, once United States Senator from New York, says he has seen his piano moved about the room without being touched by flesh and blood, and has heard tunes played upon it when no one visible was within reach. This was in his own parlor, when no medium save members of his own family was present. He was informed of the death of a friend—drowned in Lake Michigan—twenty-four hours (I think it was that time) before the news reached Fond du Lac, where he lived. Hon. Robert Dale Owen, of Indiana, in a private letter to me which I am confident he will forgive me for making public, says—

"Yes! I am as perfectly satisfied that the so-called Spiritual phenomena are real as that the rainbow and the aurora borealis are real; for I have as good proof. Indeed, more of my senses have testified in the first case than in the last. I have only seen a rainbow. I have seen, touched and heard Spiritual phenomena over and over again. I have spent most of my leisure for fifteen years testing this matter, as a chemist tests his minerals and salts in his laboratory. . . . My opinions are changed merely because I have evidence of another life now that I had not then [when he edited the Free Inquirer], but have not found evidence to prove the vicarious atonement."

But I tire your types. A thousand witnesses as good as these have testified in this matter, and yet materialism shuts her eyes and puts cotton in her ears and exclaims—"Spiritualism has no facts to stand on!" "First of all prove the existence of spirits before you assert the truths of Spiritualism!" That is, you must prove the existence of spirits before we will admit the proofs!

It is an old saying that extremes meet. Materialism and Christian theology may be said to be extreme positions in the field of thought.

Spiritualism says—"Man exists after the change called death," and produces such evidence as I have cited to prove it.

Materialism replies through Mr. Einstein:—"First of all disprove my arguments that there are no spirits, or Spiritualism itself can be nothing but a fancy!" Science asserts that man must have existed on the earth sixty thousand years ago, and produces his remains, found in positions that prove they must have lain there for that length of time. Christian theology replies:—"First of all disprove my argument that he was first created only six thousand years since, or Science itself can be nothing but a fancy." Are not these arguments analogous, and equally weighty?

In conclusion, let me entreat Mr. Einstein to take the poet's advice, and "see himself as others see him;" for really he is a logical writer on Science, but, when he attempts to reason on Spiritualism, he "wanders into vagaries, illogical, unscientific and imaginary." His difficulty about a medium passing out of the trance state when the discourse is ended is on a plane with his other arguments. The theory is that a foreign intelligence, for the time being, controls the medium. When Mr. Einstein can explain why a man takes the harness from his horse when he has finished a journey, and sets him at liberty, I will put him on the track of solving this mystery of the trance.

EDW. M. MACGRAW.

PLYMOUTH, Wis.

The Hartford Courant points out some ludicrous typographical errors which occurred in a leading religious paper. Some time ago Mr. W. R. Wilkins published three sermons, and the Christian Union gave them a cordial approval. They had in that paper the wonderful title of "God's Rescues; or the Lost Sheep, the Lost Cow and the Lost Sow." A more compact title, says the Courant, would have been "The Farm-Yard Astray." The Union said of them that "they touch those spiritual instincts which it is the business of religion to at once evoke and to satisfy." Curious to see what "spiritual instincts" the "Lost Sow" had gone about to "evoke," and wondering if "evoke" was not a misprint for "roast," some one procured the book and found that the sermons were entitled "The Lost Sheep, The Lost Coin and the Lost Son."—Seaside Oracle.

INDEX TRACTS

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION have published the following tracts, and will publish others of a similar character, if encouraged to do so by the receipt of enough orders to cover the expense:—

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no abler, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Fifteen copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. R. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. It gives reliable statistics showing that, at the lowest estimate, this system would take about Forty Thousand Years to convert the world; and quotes the highest authorities proving the utter failure of the Catholics to civilize the Paraguay Indians, and of the Protestants to civilize the Sandwich Islanders, in any true sense of the word. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Fifteen copies One Dollar.

Also, the scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition by PARKER PILLSBURY, entitled "The Sunday Question," is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents. Address—

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Circulars with list of subjects will be sent on application.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

THE PHARISEE AND THE PUBLICAN.

[Read to the Unitarian Society in Dover, N. H., Oct. 20, 1871.]

"And he spake this parable unto certain which trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others: Two men went up into the temple to pray, the one a Pharisee, and the other a publican. The Pharisee stood and prayed thus with himself 'God, I thank thee that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican. I fast twice in the week, I give tithes of all that I possess.' And the publican, standing afar off, would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven, but smote upon his breast, saying—'God be merciful to me a sinner!' I tell you, this man went down to his house justified rather than the other; for every one that exalteth himself shall be abased, and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted."

LUKE, xviii, 9-14.

The word "Pharisee" comes from a Hebrew word which signifies separated, and seems to have had its origin in the time of the Maccabees, about a century and a half before the birth of Christ. The conquest of the East by Alexander the Great and his followers had brought the Jews very largely under the influence of Greek thought and Greek customs. It was the distinct purpose of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Greek King of Syria, to break down the barrier between them and his other subjects by destroying the Jewish national religion and institutions; and those who stubbornly resisted these efforts out of strong attachment to the faith and traditions of their fathers received the name of Pharisees or the Separatists. In later times, the prestige of the Pharisees among the common people was doubtless greatly owing to the fact that they had had their origin as a sect in this patriotic adherence to national ideas. At the time of Jesus, they were pre-eminently the national party among the Jews, and surpassed all others in devotion to the ritual, traditions, and customs handed down from the past. They were the orthodox disciples of Moses; and their distinguishing characteristic, their fundamental principle as a sect, consisted in a belief that, besides the written law preserved in the Pentateuch or so-called "Five Books of Moses," the great founder of their nation had also transmitted an oral law to complete and explain it. It was a prime article of faith with every Pharisee that in the Penta-teuch there was no precept or regulation, whether ceremonial, doctrinal, or legal, of which God had not given to Moses all explanations necessary for its application in all cases, with the order to transmit them by word of mouth.

For instance, it is a very remarkable fact that the Pentateuch contains no recognition of the doctrine of immortality, and no injunction of the duty of prayer. At a period of Jewish history when immortality was commonly believed in, and prayer was universally practised, it would have been scandalous to admit that Moses had left no instructions on these essential points; and, as the written law contained none, the Pharisees taught that they were embraced in the oral law. The traditions of the elders and the rabbins, therefore, assumed vast importance in the eyes of every devout Jew; and these, in course of time, had become so full, precise, and minute, as to regulate by solemn rules even such trivial points of worship as what kind of wick and oil should be used on the Sabbath.

This oral law, consequently, reverence for which was the peculiar characteristic of the Pharisee, became in time an insupportable burden. It treated men like children, formulating and prescribing the minutest particulars of ritual observance. We can easily understand, then, the intense hatred which Paul expresses for the "bondage" of the "law," as contrasted with the freedom of the gospel: we can easily see the force of such expressions as "weak and beggarly elements," "burdens too heavy to bear," &c., applied to the precepts of the law. Jesus again and again showed great contempt for these precepts, as for instance those concerning eating and washing of hands. In fact, his natural contempt for these precepts of the Pharisees seems to have passed sometimes into harshness and even bitterness of condemnation of the Pharisees themselves. The Pharisees, as a class, were not hypocrites nor insincere men; they were simply intense formalists and bigots. It is never fair to judge men by the wholesale—to condemn them by classes; and in the sweeping denunciations of Jesus against the Pharisees the only way to excuse the evident want of charity and proper discrimination is the dubious supposition that his spirit is misrepresented by the record.

At the same time, his charges against them were true so far as their teachings, and the effect of their teachings on themselves and others, were concerned; although, as in the case of slavery and slaveholders, the vice was still more in the system than in the men. Whoever makes religion to consist of countless rules and forms for outward conduct, in the same proportion withdraws his attention from its real spirit and essence; and the inevitable effect of the Pharisaic system was to make the Pharisees more or less the victims of self-complacency and spiritual pride, or (what is still worse) of hypocrisy. We cannot over value the trivial, without undervaluing the important; and the worst result of Pharisaism in religion is the spiritual deadness it engenders. Those in our own day who lay stress on creeds or sacraments or forms of any kind, and regard these as essential things, tread in the footprints of the Pharisees, and, like them, forget that God requires nothing of us but "to do justly and love mercy and walk humbly" with him. It was the essence of Judaism to govern men's conduct by a most intricate and burdensome system of petty rules; it is the essence of rational religion to govern men's conduct by a few comprehensive principles—to create in their hearts the spirit of faithfulness, truthfulness, and love, and to leave this to work out its inevitable result in their conduct and character. The one is slavery,—the other, freedom; and in order to accomplish his work, Jesus had to set at defiance the whole system, authority, and influence of the Pharisees. They were the party of "obstructives," opposing in honest bigotry or hypocritical selfishness the aims of the great reformer; and if he, in his brave, radical attacks on the system and spirit of Pharisaism, made wholesale and indiscriminate denunciation of the Pharisees themselves, he fell into the same error as that of the early anti-slavery reformers, who, in their hatred of slavery, made too little distinction in their denunciation of slaveholders. Let much be pardoned to a noble indignation against the wrong and false, to a divine enthusiasm for the right and true; a soul fired with such inspirations may easily lapse from cool and even-handed justice. Yet it is better to be always scrupulously and exactly just, even to the worst of men: and, as the record stands, I find myself called upon to make some allowance, to exercise some charity of judgment, for Jesus' hot invectives against the Pharisees. They were not all hypocrites, not all extortioners, not all bigots: unless human nature was then what it is not now, there must have been noble exceptions among them, souls too great and pure to be ruined even by a baleful and rotten system. On Pharisaism, therefore, on the spirit of formalism, narrowness and bigotry, let the indignation and wrath descend which Jesus poured out on the Pharisees themselves.

As the Pharisees were Hebrews of the Hebrews, the national Jewish party, the historical product of Judaism as a system of religion, and therefore the best exponents of its spirit and tendency, so the Publicans were the opposite extreme. They were the mere creation of foreign conquest, the mere tools of Roman oppression. It was the custom of the Roman Senate to farm out the revenues; that is, to entrust the collecting of them to the highest bidder, who agreed to pay into the treasury a fixed sum, and was allowed in return large discretionary power in the assessment of taxes. Of course, boundless corruption and extortion were the result of such a system, the worst effects of which were felt in the provinces farthest from Rome. Contracts for farming the revenues fell into the hands of wealthy capitalists, who formed a kind of stock company, and employed everywhere their agents and sub agents. In New Testament language, the lowest of these officials, the actual tax-collectors, were called publicans, although, in Latin, the term properly belongs to the capitalists at Rome who employed them; and they were commonly chosen from among the natives of the different provinces, as being best acquainted with the customs and languages of the people. No employment, of course, could be more unpopular, and none but the basest of the populace could, as a rule, be induced to accept it. They overcharged whenever they had a chance; they brought false accusations of smuggling, for the purpose of extorting hush-money; they detained and opened letters on mere suspicion; in fact, they were everywhere looked upon as the wolves and bears of human society, and it was a current proverb—"All publicans, all robbers." In Palestine, especially, they were hated bitterly, as the office itself tended to develop the very worst traits of Jewish character, and as the paying of tribute was believed to be contrary to the law of Moses. The Jews looked upon the publicans not only as oppressors and extortioners, but also as traitors to the nation and apostates from the national religion, and entertained towards them the same feelings which, in Ireland, the people entertain towards those Roman Catholics who take service in collecting tithes for the English church, or in ejecting tenants under the order of English landlords. It was thus a biting sarcasm in the Jews to call Jesus "the friend of publicans and sinners," and to accuse Him of "eating and drinking" with them. He claimed to be their Messiah, their national sovereign; and to call him the "friend of publicans" was the same as to call our American President the "friend of copperheads." Could there be a greater disgrace in patriotic eyes? Yet, notwithstanding the unpopularity of his course, he associated with publicans quite as much as with their betters, admitted them among his disciples, and even chose one of them, Matthew, to be an apostle. With Zaccheus he went cheerfully to dine, and seemed far better welcomed in his house than in the house of Simon the Pharisee.

Such, then, were the Pharisees and the Publicans, —the one class honored as the disciples of Moses and the bulwark of the nation, the other hated as friends of Beelzebub and slavish tools of the Romans. The parable, if it describes an actual fact observed by Jesus, as may well have been the case, illustrates a trait in his character worthy of all admiration, namely, quickness to see and appreciate unpretending goodness even in the despised. Who but one in love with all spiritual beauty would have listened to the contrite prayer of a poor, excommunicated tax-gatherer, or noted the self-sacrifice of a poor widow, casting her copper into the contribution-box? Or, if the parable is only a story invented to convey symbolically a high moral truth, then it equally well illustrates another noble trait in his character,—his chivalrous disregard of popular likes and dislikes, his brave selection of the most unpopular persons to exemplify the truth he designs to teach. Why set a publican over against a Pharisee to show the beauty of humility and sincere contrition? Could he not have made a contrast between two Pharisees as well? Would it not have been more politic thus to conciliate the prejudices of his hearers, and avoid all offence to their nice appreciation of respectability? Would he not have done more good by his parable, if he had not needlessly shocked their reverence for the orthodox defenders of religion by trying to inspire respect for a despised publican?

No, friends, no! When a man who aims to instruct the people stops to conciliate their whims or follies, and forbears to put his thought in the most striking form out of regard to expediency, somehow or other the ring is gone from his voice and the fire from his eye; he plunges the hot metal of his enthusiasm into the cold waters of policy, and spoils its fine temper. When Jesus wanted to teach the lesson of self-forgetful humanity, he made the priest and the Levite, the officials of the sacred temple, pass the wounded man unfeeling by on the other side, while he made the hated Samaritan display the mercy and pity, the deep human tenderness, which they disdained. Thus even in the most beautiful of his parables Jesus lets appear the underlying sternness of his spirit, his unsuppressed rebuke to popular prejudice, his uncompromising loyalty to the demands of his idea. Had he faltered in his willingness to shock the reverence of the people for their false objects of reverence,—had he forborne to trample rudely on their respect for the Sabbath and the priesthood, the temple and the law and the traditions of the elders,—he would have pleased them better, and been forgotten to-day. He saw plainly that, before he could enthrone in their hearts reverence for that which is really reverend, he must unseat reverence for that which is unworthy of it,—that he must faithfully perform the negative, as well as the affirmative, part of his work. He could not arouse sympathy for the penitent grief of the publican except by arousing dislike of the proud self-sufficiency of the Pharisee; the contrast of the two was essential to his idea, and no tenderness for the people's superstitious respect for the Pharisees hindered him from following his idea.

Why did Jesus laud the outcast, and condemn the respectable man? Why was the publican "justified" rather than the Pharisee?

1. Because the Pharisee made religion consist in outward observance rather than in inward purity. Fasting twice a week and giving tithes of all that he possessed seemed in his own eyes conclusive proof that he was better than other men,—more religious, better pleasing to God; as if one nowadays should think himself entitled to God's special favor simply by eating fish on Friday. The piety which ends in ostentatious forms is no cause for sanctimony or brag; least of all for sneers at others. The publican, with his consciousness of vast spiritual needs, his desire for inward purification, and his longing for a truer union with God in will and purpose, was immeasurably higher than the proud, pompous formalist that pretended to look down upon him. Better is one honest effort to improve, one repentant tear, one passionate aspiration for holier being, than uncounted acts of cold, mechanical service. All value is in the soul.

2. By the conduct of others did the Pharisee judge himself, while the publican judged himself by the laws of God. To be not as other men, to escape the snags they are wrecked on, to be better in his own conceit than the publican,—this is enough for the Pharisee, then and always. How many there are who content themselves with attaining an average character, neither better nor worse than their neighbors! How many there are who, if they contrive to escape some particular mote they see in other people's eyes, plume themselves on their exceeding virtue, forgetting the beam in their own eyes! It is the characteristic of the Pharisee everywhere to judge his own character and conduct by that of other men; and whoever does this may always, by a little ingenuity, a little judicious blindness to his own weak side, a little sagacity in the selection of points of comparison, find abundant cause for complacency and self-gratulation. But the poor publican, forgetting his neighbors, remembering only the perfect law of God and his own failure to obey it, sorrows over the aberrations of his own conduct from the ways of God, and in simple-hearted contrition exclaims,—“God be merciful to me a sinner!” While the thought of the Divine Purity fills his soul, there is no room for the recollection of other men's sins, and no chance for vain-glorious comparisons. The secret of genuine self-knowledge, that beautiful and heavenly grace, lies in the habit of reverence for the universal, not the conventional, standard of duty and life. Judged by that, who shall presume to exalt himself?

3. The Pharisee, because he was contented to compare himself with other men and saw fit to call himself better than they, settled down into the apathy of respectability, without any uncomfortable desires for real spiritual excellence: he was not at all pestered by aspiration. No one can aspire who is satisfied. Let a soul once catch a glimpse of better things, and it will refuse to rest in self-satisfaction. For one who is content with average goodness, nothing is so unsafe as reflection upon laws of duty higher than the world's conventional code. But the publicans of this world, who in their simplicity fancy that God's law is higher than the world's code, and who are foolish enough to ponder its great and broad requirements, burn with aspirations for a perfect life; they become conscious of an ideal they only partially attain, and in deep disappointment at repeated defeats remember their failures with a sigh. Give me the publican's living aspiration, rather than the Pharisee's complacent pride and spiritual decay. Is not life, with all its ills, better than death? Is not motion better than stagnation? Is not the eternal uprising of the soul against its inward tyrants better than contented, slavish submission to their sway? In vain shall we nurse our religion with self-conceit; true humility is the nourishment of all divine life, and the beginning of all spiritual greatness. I believe in a self-respect that protests against every violation of the inward law. “A broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise.”

THE BELIEF IN MIRACLES TENDS LOGICALLY TO ATHEISM.

If modern science has established anything as true beyond all peradventure, it is that the Universe, although multifarious, is a unit; and that all its parts are under law. Even the forces of Nature, which a century ago were deemed distinct and independent, are proved to be all correlated and conserved, running round their circuit of change forever. The universe with all its vast complexity of persons, things, and events, sustaining necessary relations to each other, and presenting to the mind of an ignorant person the appearance of confusion and chance, has, nevertheless, a plan, which time in its progress simply unfolds to human view. This plan, conceived, so to speak, in Divine wisdom and goodness, is executed by the power of God in all its details, irrespective of the opinions, wishes, wills, and acts of any created intelligence, for it includes all these. Then if design in the universe proves a Designer, the credit of the Designer among his intelligent creatures must depend not only on the wisdom and benevolence of the design, but especially upon the unflinching execution of the plan. If he has to experiment on his plan before settling it permanently, as Fulton did with his steamboat experiments; or if, after settling the machinery a-going, he has to stop its motion because he finds a screw loose, or a piston-rod either too long or too short, it shows that he did not see the end from the beginning, but was ignorant of the way in which the machine would work. Such a Designer as that, not being perfect in wisdom and knowledge, cannot command the respect and confidence of intelligent beings.

Now what is a miracle? It is an arrest of the machinery of the universe at the instance of a mortal man—a repeal, at least for the time being, of the undeviating laws of Nature on which depends the welfare of the whole, in order to make on those who see or hear of it a religious impression or belief which the steady working of the machine would not produce. The advocate of a religion who could so influence God as to get him to interpose in the natural course of events and stop it, is worthy of belief in every thing he utters; for God would not lend almighty power to a man who would lie and deceive his fellow-men. This is the agreement. But who does not see that a miracle-working God cannot command the homage and confidence of men; for all the miracles we read of offer themselves to our credence on the strength of historical evidence, there being equally well attested miracles among Pagans, Christians, and Mohammedans.

Now if God at the instance of a Pope, or Catholic Bishop, works a miracle to prove the truth of the popish religion, what will Protestants think of such a God? If a Hindu, by the power of God, works miracles in behalf of his religion what would Christians think of such a God? The order of the universe is arrested to-day to prove popery true; to-morrow to prove Hinduism true; the next day to prove Christianity to be true. How can we respect such a changeable Being who, if he has a plan at all, alters it at the suggestion of ignorant mortals, and in the interest alternately of different, and hostile religions? But if we find that God is fickle and inconstant, either having no plan, or violating it at the request of different religious zealots, we soon cease, not only to respect, but to confide in him; for worship, whether true or false in its object, proves that the worshipper has confidence in the Being worshipped. If then we cannot confide in God, the next step is to disbelieve in his existence. This is the soul's process of change from faith in God to unbelief, produced by the argument for miracles. First, we cease to respect a Being who undertakes to plan and rule the universe, but has, after all, no confidence in his own wisdom, seeing that he listens to the suggestions of ignorant mortals, and alters his plan. Then we bring home this reflection to our soul's consciousness, and cease to confide in Him as the Ruler over all. Then we cease to worship a Being who by his foolishness proves himself to be unworthy of our worship. Then we come to the conclusion that there is no God at all.

Take, for instance, the miracle of Joshua commanding the Sun to stand still, which is as well authenticated as any other in the Bible. The case was this. Joshua, in order to give the Jews sufficient daylight to wreak their vengeance on the Amorites, arrested the progress of the Sun in his course through the heavens, and caused it to “stand still” a whole day upon Gibeon; and the Moon in the valley of Ajalon. God, in obedience to this mortal, stops the machinery of our Solar System a whole day. Joshua, at that ignorant age, evidently thought, as Prof. Tyndall remarks, that the Sun was a ball of fire which moved round the earth once a day, and that the earth, including only Palestine and the adjacent countries, was flat, and stood immovable on its foundations. But every school boy now knows that the Sun is not a little ball of fire revolving round the earth to warm and enlighten it, but is 1,400,000 times larger than our globe; and that the globe, 24,000 miles in circumference, moves round it. If the phenomena attributed to Joshua, therefore, ever occurred at all, it must have been a stopping of the earth's revolution on its axis for twenty-four hours. I know that the Bible distinctly affirms that it was the other way; but the Christian astronomers, seeing that God by his infallible word has got into a philosophical difficulty, try to help him out by virtually saying that he did not understand the movements of the Solar System, although he arranged it himself, and that it was not the Sun which Joshua commanded to stand still, but the earth.

Well, suppose it to be so. Then, according to Prof. Tyndall, the energy or force required in this stopping of the earth's motion on its axis was equal to that of six trillions of horses, working for the whole time employed by Joshua in the destruction of his foes. The amount of power thus expended would be sufficient, according to the same authority, to supply every soldier of an army a thousand times the strength of that of Joshua, with a thousand times the fighting power of each of Joshua's men, not for the few hours necessary to the extinction of a handful of Amorites, but for millions of years! See into what an absurdity we are landed by believing this miracle! Who can respect a God who should waste so much force in securing so unimportant a result? How childish to suppose that all this confusion in the solar system, and this disarrangement of the cycles of time, took place merely to allow a handful of Jews to destroy their enemies before sun-down! If God wanted to help them do this job of slaughter, it would have been much cheaper in every respect to work a miracle by putting Minie rifles into the hands of Joshua's men and teaching them by inspiration how to load and fire them off into the ranks of their enemies.

The point I make is this, that a God who would do such foolish and expensive things as stopping the revolution of the earth for “a whole day,” for an object that could be attained by infinitely cheaper means, is not worthy either of our homage or our confidence; and if the human mind is forced to the alternative of believing in such a God, or none at all, Science, which teaches us there is no such God as that, compels us into atheism. Bacon, in his Essay on Superstition, says, “It were better to have no opinion of God at all, than such an opinion as is unworthy of him;” and Plutarch, whom he quotes, says, “I had rather a great deal men should say that there was no such man at all as Plutarch, than that they should say that there was one Plutarch who would eat his own children as soon as they were born.”

Now I insist upon it that the churches of this country, in holding up the anthropomorphic character of the Gods they worship as taught in the Bible are preparing the rising generation for atheism. I say Gods, for each sect holds forth for the belief of the people a God whose character squares with the doctrines and worship of the sect. The Calvinist has a fiery and revengeful God who likes the smell of burning heretics. The Catholic has a God who abominates Protestants, and will drive them all down to hell. The Methodist has a God who is hard of hearing, and who stultifies himself by shutting his eyes against all future actions that are evil, lest he be responsible for their character and effect. The Universalist's God unbars the gates of heaven, and lets all in, irrespective of character. The Episcopalian has a remarkably proper and respectable God, who contemplates with serene benignity a well-fitting gown and bands. But the most contemptible of all these ideal Gods is the one which the Unitarians have imagined; for he is neither the one thing nor the other. Each one of these sects, to say nothing of the others whose name is legion for they are many, insists that their God is the true God, and the people in their inextricable confusion can only seek relief in atheism.

This, then, is the state of the case. The 40,000 pulpits in this land, under the idea of teaching religion, are giving the people such false and contradictory conceptions of the character of God as will drive all their intelligent people into stark atheism, unless they are snatched as brands from the burning by the hand of Science. Thank heaven, however, for the arrangement by which, when a man becomes intelligent enough to see that the Gods of the churches are a diverse set of contemptible beings who have no real existence, he has intelligence enough also to see that the glorious Being whom Science reveals is the true God and eternal life. As soon as he turns his back upon the Babel jargon of the churches, and rejects all miracles as libels upon the Creator's wisdom, and sees and admires the undeviating order of the universe, and remembers that benevolence as a motive presides over the whole, his faith in God revives and strengthens, and he goes on his upward way rejoicing.

MODERN GIRONDINS AND JACOBINS.

ED. INDEX:—It is an old adage that "history repeats itself." Though somewhat hackneyed, it will bear repetition, for history is but the record of the actions of mankind, and human nature is the same whether regarded in the past or the present. But the point to which I especially desire to invite attention is the resemblance between the American religious conflict of 1871 and the French political conflict of 1791-92. As the story of the French Revolution is so well known, all will readily recall the names and characters of its chief actors.

We have had our philosophes in the "liberal" denominations, embracing such men as Channing, Murray, Ballou, and others, whose trumpet-tongues have aroused the thought of the slumbering millions—at first a gentle rivulet with well-defined margin, but now a mighty Amazonian stream. Later we had our Mirabeau in Parker, whose sympathetic heart and clear vision saw other issues than purely speculative ones, and whose eloquent tongue spoke for thousands whom reason had led forth from bondage, and was still leading on to newer and broader themes, the logical outcome of freedom. When Mirabeau died, political liberty suffered no loss, for Mirabeau's power lay in the fact that he had but expressed the popular feeling, giving voice to the struggling thought of the age. So through Parker's death religious freedom received no hindrance, for the growing sentiment of thoughtful minds, of which he was such an eloquent representative, still lived and was increasing day by day. Only in their positions as Prophets of Reason, logical and eloquent exponents of the Inevitable, are these men to be compared. Though both died lamented by all friends of freedom, no hand has ever yet risen among them to destroy the bust or execrate the name of Parker.

Reason, once unshackled, must speed on and on, its course marked out by no momentary representative, but to be defined by circumstances, and its force to be measured only by the strength of the opposing element.

In France, the arbitrary measures and haughty demeanor of the ruling classes had produced a deep-seated feeling of hate on the part of those who had suffered under their tyrannous rule; and their inability to perceive that what was outgrown should be abandoned led to measures that could not but produce conflict. Mirabeau being dead, the desire for freedom, still alive, without his restraining hand took rapid strides onward. So when Parker died, the controlling influence was removed from those who saw still further on—"new heights to climb and broader fields to win."

In the National Convention of 1792 were gathered the most fervid and eloquent orators, the most polished and intellectual culture, and the most learned and scholarly tastes that ever graced a legislative hall. Earnest and sincere in their attachment to republican principles, devout worshippers of Liberty, and with clear and well-defined ideas of the mode through which freedom could be attained, they yet fell, and justly; for the same reasoning faculties that had opened their eyes, had also operated upon the sight of others, and the Twenty-five Millions of starving and half-clothed men and women represented in the Jacobin "Mountain" did not see that the sole requirements of the time were Respectability and Order under Girondin rule.

In our own time we find among the friends of spiritual freedom a party gathered under the banner of "Free Religion," embracing the intellectual culture, the scholarly refinement and the cultivated tastes of the Liberal cause, an Association with a President as intellectual and cultured as a Vergniaud, a Secretary as logical and philosophical as a Condorcet, a paper edited with more than the ability of Brissot and the fiery ardor of Max Isnard. Other allies it has, though not of it—an impetuous and ready-tongued Camille Desmoulins to usher in the "Golden Age," and an impulsive Barbaroux who turns his "Examiner" upon time-honored names only to find them unworthy of reverence, and will not accord decent burial.

What more could radicals desire? Are they not devoted? Are they not of tried sincerity? The storm they have raised, can they not control? Ah no! If they repeat the fatal folly of the Girondins and but seek to control, they are lost, for the Jacobin element is not lacking in our own times. Back of them in incessant surges rolling its angry waves ever higher and fiercer, we behold a Jacobin party claiming already its E even Millions of adherents, men and women who have also listened to the siren voice of Reason, and strike rapidly at conclusions. Small reverence have they for oratorical flugling that dwells only on intellectual heights far above their atmosphere level. Respectability is not their chief desideratum. With a common aim in view, they consider, not how it may be attained consistently with Order, but how regardless of your ideas of Respectability and Order. Eloquent dissertations on toleration, polished apostrophes to mental freedom, and honeyed protests against rampant bigotry awaken but a sneer from our Jacobins. Other issues have now arisen, they assert, that demand action. Our fathers fought for freedom Political; our philosophes have striven for freedom Spiritual; Reason demands freedom Social. This is the rallying cry of our growing Jacobin party. You have bidden us follow Reason, they assert, Reason and Liberty; what if she now again points to newer and broader themes?

We have our "insurrection of women" demanding from the grasp of "the tyrant man," and the still more relentless clutch of Nature, free scope to God-given inclinations. At the recent annual gathering of the Jacobin Chief Priests at Troy was heard the voice of Reason in her most "advanced" position—marriage characterized as a ceremony before a man who only differed from other men in wearing "his shirt on the outside!"—women also clamorous for suitable persons to seal "spiritual affinities." Wisely did they in accepting the leadership of Demoiselle Theroigne.

An Anacharsis Clootz is not wanting, with his plans for embracing all mankind in one grand brotherly scheme of Universology. Chaumettes, Heberts, Gobelns abound, too numerous to mention.

But the days of 1793 are not yet upon us, though rapidly drawing nigh. We have yet our Royalists, adherents of King Jesus, busy in plots and counterplots to secure this throne against the assault being made upon it. To these demands of the Jacobins they but shriek their old women cries in shrill and acrid tones. "We told you so! You see the natural consequences of deserting the throne!" O simpletons! when our Puritan fathers left the tools in your hands to complete the Temple of Liberty, why did ye not build, rather than stand idly disputing with him that held a saw that he should have a hammer, he with a plane demanding that all should hold planes alike, till in the Babel of contending sounds others stepped in to save all from ruin!

Will our Girondins continue to dally with the enemies of society and home sanctities under the mistaken idea that they are merely misguided friends, and permit history to repeat itself, until this wind from Below, augmenting day by day, becomes such a storm as will sweep off not only themselves, but all they hold dear, into Space?

These are your allies, O Girondins, who must be fellowshiped or disowned. They have drunk from the same fountain, partaken from the same table, listened to the same voice of Reason, and have reached—Demoiselle Theroigne!

DYER D. LUM.

[Experience shows that popular impatience or passion can never carry the day in the arena of conflicting ideas as it has often done in legislative bodies. If the "eleven millions of Jacobins" lose their reason, they will find their Napoleon soon enough; a community of lunatics never yet lacked a king. The sanctity of home and home-relations is safe just so long as the people keep their common sense. But the "Girondins" will richly earn the guillotine, if they dare to choke discussion on social questions or disfellowship any one for independent thought. The triumph of their cause is fixed as fate, if they are content to fight folly with wisdom—content to let the Jacobinism of "Free Love" commit hara-kiri. Whoever undertakes to sit on the valve of free speech through which the escape-steam of society must pass, will get no pity from us for the involuntary journey into Space above predicted.—ED.]

Dr. Franklin, when a child, found the long graces used by his father before and after meals, very tedious. One day, after the winter's provisions were salted, Benjamin said to his father, "I think, father, if you would say grace over the whole cask, once for all, it would be a vast saving of time."

"I had hoped to have been a subscriber to it, but circumstances compelled me to forgo several gratifications of a similar kind, and sent me for a while to this tropical, dreary country [Brazil]. After nearly fifty years (let me write it in very small characters!) of life in Boston, one who comes to such a semi-barbarous country and people misses many things which are thought little of there, perhaps, but the absence of which he feels severely. In the interior and with the natives, gross ignorance is only equalled by their stolid contentment with their condition; with the traders and in the towns the ignorance is only less dense, but with it are a host of little meannesses, which mercantile pursuits, unaccompanied with any education, or liberalizing influences, are apt to engender. Ages must elapse before a very marked improvement is of general attainment. Where to begin, and how, is a very perplexing question. Perhaps the best summary of the condition of the people is the statement, made to me by reliable persons, that the grant by the government of this province to the churches for fireworks and display is six times the entire annual grant for all educational purposes. What more need be said?"

"I thank you most cordially for not erasing my name from your subscription list, as I feared you might because of my tardiness in forwarding the money. But the fact is, money has been scarce with me. It is but little I can do for the promulgation of progressive ideas, yet my spirit rejoices and is made glad by the fearless utterances of you and your co-workers. The first volume I have bound, and I am saving up this second volume. How often I would like an extra number to send to some friend to awaken their thought or quicken their heart as it does mine! May you be greatly blessed, purified and strengthened in your labors."

"I think the article on Thomas Paine was very good indeed, in a late number of THE INDEX, and the time may possibly come when some historian will do him justice. I have a volume of his 'Age of Reason' and Bible Criticisms, which has been carefully left packed away for ten years in the bottom of a trunk, where people would not see it; but last winter I told my wife to dig it up and give it the most conspicuous place in my library, as being one of the most orthodox books on the shelf."

"Having seen favorable notices of your paper in the columns of the Present Age, and being a natural admirer of those who have the moral courage to stand up fearlessly and proclaim their highest convictions of what is good, and act without regard to 'what will people say,' I enclose sixty cents for three months' trial of your independent sheet, feeling that by that time I shall become acquainted with your liberal teachings, and, I doubt not, humanitarian efforts."

"I cannot now stop to tell you how much I esteem THE INDEX, but for your encouragement I say go on. I am professedly orthodox, but I desire to know what can in fairness be said against my faith, and I entertain no opinions on any subject which I would not surrender, when it is evident that they cannot be successfully defended. Nothing is fairer than your proposition to accept every result of science and sound learning."

"I will do what I can in this priest-ridden, orthodox nest for THE INDEX. The sun of truth is slowly but truly rising."

BOOK NOTICES.

D. Appleton and Company have just published a new edition of Mr. Darwin's "Journal of Researches into the Natural History and Geology of the Countries visited during the Voyage of H. M. S. Beagle round the World." A more instructive or delightful book in every respect it would be difficult to find. Mr. Darwin's wonderful power of observation let nothing escape. Everything had to pay toll as it passed before the eyes of this modern Argus, and contribute its mite to the rich treasury of his "Journal." It would be a great mistake to suppose that the book is a mere accumulation of dry scientific details. On the contrary, it is juicy with humor, anecdote, and adventure; and no one of Mr. Darwin's works so frankly admits you to the charmed circle of his individuality. His "Origin of Species," "Variation of Animals and Plants under Domestication," and "Descent of Man" reveal the genius of the man of science, whose patient observation of all facts and unrivalled power of co-ordinating them are the servants of a great organizing intellect; but here you find also the genial companion, the enterprising traveller, the large-hearted and thoughtful man of the world. Whoever wants to know Mr. Darwin himself as well as his world-famous speculations must buy this book; and having once bought it, he will read it through to the end.

The "Fables of Pilpay," published by Hurd and Houghton, is a beautiful little edition of a work sure to be popular in these days of increasing interest in Oriental literature. Pilpay, or Bidpai, was a Hindu fabulist to whom are popularly attributed certain apologues found in the Sanskrit Pankatantra and Hitopadesa. Max Mueller gives an account in his "Chips from a German Workshop" [Vol. II, p. 229] of the various migrations, translations, and re-translations of these ancient stories, some of which re-appear in modern dress in La Fontaine. Æsop, Phædrus, Lokman, each had a finger in the same pie, without perhaps knowing anything of the original pastry-cook. There is something fabulous about these fabulists themselves; but the stories (for they deserve that name) of this little volume are very charming,—none the less so that we recognize many old friends in unfamiliar garb. The longest of them, that of "Kalila and Damna," strikingly resembles the well-known story of "Reynard the Fox."

According to an account of this work in the "Royal Asiatic Society's Transactions," scarcely any book but the Bible has been translated into so many different languages; and the quaint wisdom of its teachings explains the fact. Such fables as these are probably the product of no one man's brain, but rather embody the condensed experience of many generations. Without the extreme brevity and pithiness of Æsop, Pilpay has what Æsop lacks—the interest of continued narration.

"Parturition without Pain," by Dr. M. L. Holbrook, editor of the New York Herald of Health, is an invaluable little treatise for prospective mothers. He relies largely on the fruit-diet system for preventing pain in child-birth, recommended in Mr. Rowbotham's scarce pamphlet of the year 1841. The facts and arguments adduced have great intrinsic weight, and justify at least a fair trial of the system. Dr. Holbrook's book is full of information and hints of great value on many matters connected with his subject; and we are glad to say that we have not been obliged to make the deductions usually so necessary in estimating the importance of works of this class. Visionary and half-educated reformers too often assume to play the role of physician, and put their own imaginations forward in the place of scientific realities. The only paragraph that has seemed to us at all whimsical is one containing a statement (p. 56) that "drink of any kind is foreign to human nature in its original capacity, &c." The treatise is one of sterling excellence, and should be very widely circulated, not only among wives, but among husbands as well. There could be no scientific discovery of a more benign character than one that should make parturition painless. What a world of agony it would save! And if this great benefit should universally result from so simple a system as is here recommended, as seems to have been the case in the instances cited, the gratuitous circulation of Dr. Holbrook's book should be a recognized part of the woman-movement.

Another of the cheap "Handy Volume" series of Dickens's works, published by D. Appleton and Company, is "Martin Chuzzlewit." Every one who has read this story will agree that it is one of the best that the great novelist ever wrote. Mrs. Gamp and her apocryphal friend Mrs. Harris, noble and simple-hearted Tom Pinch, Pecksniff the prince of hypocrites, and the rest, are classic creations in the world of romance; and they bid fair to outlive many who fancy they have built for themselves a monument more lasting than brass. The volume is illustrated, very clearly printed with small type, and bound in the handsome brown-and-black style which is characteristic of many of Appleton's recent publications.

The above works can all be had of Mr. H. S. Stebbins, 115 Summit Street, Toledo.

"The Spiritual Pilgrim," published by William White and Company, of Boston, is a biography of J. M. Peebles, the well-known Spiritualist lecturer. There seems to us a singular impropriety in publicly telling the story of a life only half lived, unless to meet the exigencies of a political campaign, or for some other reason equally urgent. We cannot honestly praise this book. It is nauseating by its flatteries and its sickly sentimentalities. The business is over-done. We doubt not Mr. Peebles is a very worthy man; but he has been frightfully mangled "in the house of his friends." He is now, we believe, in Europe. He had better stay until his "biography" is forgotten; or if he returns soon, it would be wise for him to start afresh with a change of name. His biographer has turned the trumpet of fame into a fish-horn, from the excruciating screech of which a modest man would gladly escape at any cost.

HERESY CRYSTALLIZED.

The thing that prevents the less conservative denominations—as the Quakers, Unitarians, and Universalists—from becoming really progressive, is the same thing that prevented the formation of an anti-slavery party in Kentucky, according to Cassius Clay. “The trouble is,” he said, “that, as soon as a Kentuckian becomes anti-slavery, he removes into Ohio. The men are converted, but the State makes no progress.” In the same way, if those bodies still held within their ranks the men who have gone out of them in a radical direction, the organizations would now be radical. But it happens that the very fact of radicalism commonly takes a man out; or at least he becomes indifferent to organizations from which he has so little to hope. The wonder to me is, not that these bodies do not advance in sentiment, but that they do not retrograde faster. That they do not, proves the increase of radical opinions among the young, who are still coming forward in such organizations, and seeking there what elder radicals had already sought without success.

And on the other hand, these bodies are obtaining what is balm to the souls of reactionary leaders—more and more recognition from the evangelical sects which they were created to oppose. Instead of the “Quakerism not Christianity” of stout old Dr. Cox, (written not fifty years ago), we find the Quaker preachers readily admitted into the pulpits of other denominations, whenever “Yearly Meeting” brings them together. I remember, when a child, to have been taken for the first time to a Methodist church, and to have opened on this endearing passage in the hymn-book,—

“The Unitarian fiend expel
And drive his doctrine back to Hell.”

But now that prince of darkness is a gentleman; and the Unitarian clergy, by assiduous attention to the proprieties, and sometimes by surrendering nearly every principle they ever fought for, are really obtaining quite a decent standing in the ecclesiastical world, and are being honored with an occasional crumb or so, in the way of compliment, from the religious press,—and may yet climb into a few evangelical pulpits, as the Quakers have done. Already Dr. Bellows makes it his boast that, at a meeting of clergymen, he found himself more capable of believing in the miraculous birth of Jesus than were his evangelical brethren.

While the heresies of the past are thus crystallizing, the free thought of the times is flowing round all these obstructions, and, instead of submerging them, simply flows onward and leaves them where they are. “Why seek ye the living among the dead?” is the voice of the age to all live men; and if there is anything more hopelessly dead than an organization of “Conservative” Quakers, “Conservative” Unitarians or “Conservative” Universalists, I should be sorry to encounter it. The only use of these institutions seems to me to be that the children reared in them will find them a little more easy to shake off than the yoke of Methodism or Episcopalianism. That very bright novel, “The Member for Paris,” says that “journalism is an admirable profession, provided you don’t remain in it;” and it is the chief merit of these once heretical bodies that they are so well provided with the means of exit. Carlyle, in his preface to the English edition of Em-erson’s Essays, congratulates the world that this great American thinker did not trouble himself about “the ghost-of-improved-Socialism.” After heresies once become crystallized, they seem to me less interesting than the stronger Orthodoxies from which they sprang.

T. W. H.

“LIGHT WITHOUT HEAT.”

In number 91 of THE INDEX, in the column of “Voices from the People,” is an extract from a letter written in a very kindly spirit of criticism, wherein the writer makes this complaint:—“Your paper contains light without heat. You will excuse the liberty I take of writing to you as I have done. But sometimes the question will arise in my mind—‘Will the reading of such writings leave a man better than they found him?’ That is the main question.”

Prof. Tyndall, in his last work on “Light and Electricity,” tells us that there is one spot in the eye that is “insensible to the action of light;” it is the point “where the optic nerve enters the eye and from which it ramifies to form the net-work of the retina.” This spot he names the “blind spot.” It has often seemed to me that most of those who turn their critical eye upon the believers in Free Religion manage to look exactly through this “blind spot” and to see in our work and purpose neither light nor heat. It is encouraging, therefore, when (like the writer above quoted) one can see even the “light.” With the light to guide him he must soon find the “heat.”

We are by necessity compelled to appear in the role of iconoclasts. Our immediate object is to break in pieces and scatter the light of religion. We hold up our logical prism and force a ray of what is popularly called religion to pass through,—for the same reason and in the same spirit, I hope, that Prof. Tyndall forces through his “light-sifter” a ray of sun-light,—to determine and demonstrate its composition. We think we have found in the spectrum of Christianity several black lines of superstition and some blue and greenish errors and absurdities; and we ask men to look for themselves. Most Christians refuse to look. They are like the Professor of Padua who could not look at the planets through the telescope of Galileo for fear he might see something unpleasant to think of; or if they do look, it is too often through the “blind spot” in their eye. I cannot much blame the clergy for obliquity of vision, for what could they do with all their old prisms? This reminds me of an anecdote of an old Connecticut lady, who was much troubled by the prospect of the introduction of gas into her village and the consequent disuse of whale oil; “for,” said she, “what will become of the poor whales?” If Abbot’s spectrum of Christianity is true, what will become of the barrels of “poor” sermons?

We who are called Free Religionists think that as individuals we have considerable warmth in our hearts. Those organs are not all cold, feelingless muscle, as many Christians imagine; and, moreover, we think there is not only light but heat also in our religion.

In the spectrum of Free Religion I can find all the light, heat, and chemical rays that I can find in a mixed state in any religion. If temporarily we seem to have separated them, and the light-rays stand alone, it is not because we would exclude the heat-rays, but because we would see their distinction and learn the composition of pure light. We see clearly this distinction, and we ask others to see it and confess the truth.

Now why do we desire that others should see as we see? Our correspondent asks,—will such “light” make man “better?” which he thinks is the “main question.” Do you suppose, when Sir Isaac Newton was hunting for the chain of law that keeps the moon in her orbit, that he asked himself—“will it make me better?” Or that when Tyndall analyzes the composition of light, he asks himself—“will this ‘light without heat’ make me ‘better?’” No! the “main question” with them is—“Is this true?” We have taken for granted, long ago, that truth is made for man and man for truth, and that all truth is “better” for man than any error. If it is not, then this universe is a stupendous sham; and complete mental annihilation were a consummation devoutly to be wished. If truth is not good for man, pray what is good in this world? If it is good, then is it not good, “better,” best that man should possess it?

The Amazonians were amused at the value Agassiz attached to some of the smaller fishes which they thought only fit to be thrown away. They measured the value of the fish by the size of the fry,—just the way some people measure truth. Agassiz was on the scent of a great principle, and didn’t prize avoir du pois; but the Indians could see in the fish nothing but soup. So there are a good many people in Christendom who want to weigh truth in butchers’ scales. Unless they can see how the back-bone of a principle can be at once converted into soup, they are ready to throw it away as of no practical service to humanity. Not that such people are selfish,—they are often very benevolent and self-sacrificing; but the trouble is that they measure high principles by the low rule of material value. Of course, we believe that any truth will make man “better”—that is, more of a man; but the “main question,” to the philosophic mind studying facts or principles, is not—“will they make me better?” but—“are these things or doctrines true?” They may make me uncomfortable at first by disturbing old faiths, and perhaps may make me feel for the time that I am not “better” for them. But when the transition state of doubt is fairly past, the mind finds such stability and rest as only truth can give. A believer in Free Religion ought to have a heart filled with love and benevolence for every living thing, and a hand ready to do any good work; but he must have a love for truth of its own sake and a fearless courage to follow it wherever it may lead him. If he lacks this spirit, he lacks the one thing essential. He asks primarily, not—“will this make man better?” but—“is this truth?” If it is, I can trust it will be good for me and good for all men. If we cannot trust in truth as good, “better,” best for us, we can trust in nothing.

W. H. S.

“Why not call yourself a Christian?” Because every Christian mortgages his soul to Jesus, and every freeman keeps an unincumbered title-deed to his. As for calling oneself a Christian without being so, it is manly not to be Pickwickian in religion.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

My last reports have not justified their title. Other themes urged their claims. I trust you are distributing Mr. Voysey's Bible lecture, like the beautiful streams of charity now flowing towards Chicago and the other regions so fearfully victimized by the devouring element.

I have not seen THE INDEX for a few weeks past, but hope you continue the controversy with the Foreign Missionary Boards. The history of Roman Catholic, Mahometan, and Mormon Missions is as honorable to human nature and reveals as desirable results as the designs and doings of the famous A. B. C. F. M., were their record also as well known. The Protestant Christian church will help you to expose all the evils growing out of the action of all these others, provided you will let her alone. But you must not let her alone. "The American Board," as it is sometimes called for short, has a history in connection with American slavery, particularly as relates to the American Indian Missions, at which, if truly told, the humanity even of this world would stand aghast. Do not, I pray you, forget it.

Since leaving Battle Creek on the last of September, my work has been wholly in Illinois, and mainly on the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy railroad and its branches; truly one of the best conducted and most important thoroughfares in all the west, and passing over some of the best prairie country in the world.

And in almost every important town there is a vineyard for the laborers in your modes and methods for elevating and improving mankind—vineyards where even harvests are ready to be reaped. In Peoria, Princeton, Elmwood, Earleville, La Maille, Farmington, Yates, Maquon and some other places to which I have not had time to go, though invited, Galesburg included, there are men and women, always among the most intelligent and virtuous, who are self-emancipated from the old superstitions and bigotries, and who are ready and willing to co-operate in extending light, liberty and truth to the darkened and destitute in other places.

In some towns a regular Sunday meeting is sustained, Spiritualists and Liberalists of all classes co-operating, and a good deal of important work gets done in adjoining places at the same time. In Battle Creek some of my congregation come regularly seven miles; and occasionally I had hearers from twice that distance. So in Salem, Ohio; and not unfrequently I was taken by some of these to their towns or villages, and we had evening meetings there. I wish the same could be said of more places; and, with a little exertion, it could be, and that soon.

Peoria, I am sure, should be one of these centres. I trust it ere long will be, Elmwood co-operating, where live some of the best men and noblest women of all the west, or the world. The church hereabouts has but little real influence. She lives mainly by her audacity in deceiving the unsuspecting people. When true and honest men look her priesthood in the face, men of equal or better culture, they shrink out of sight. Many of them have never read an argument against their old dogmas, long since exploded or exploding; and seem not to know that the sun-light of science and new and profounder investigation long ago gilded the mountain tops, and already begins to illumine the valleys, plains and prairies as well.

"Let there be light"—might have been the last as well as the first demand or command of the Bible. For let there be light, and the world is safe and saved.

We reciprocate with most cordial goodwill the kind wishes of the Toledo Express, which announces the success of the Index Association plan in a very handsome manner. It urges the Germans to extend hearty sympathy and aid to all such efforts on the part of Americans to disseminate rationalism in this country. Frankly recognizing the fact of individual differences of opinion, it yet finds a common platform for all rationalists in the principles of universal liberty and humanitarian reform, and shows itself wholly superior to the mean, jealous, snarling bigotry we notice in some other self-styled "liberal" papers. We are glad to see that the Express has become a daily as well as a weekly paper, and hope that its own prosperity will at least equal its generous sympathy in the prosperity of THE INDEX. We could not wish it better fortune.

He who said—"Every man has his price"—must have been himself for sale; and he who bought him never made a worse bargain.

THE MISSION QUESTION.

On page 306 of THE INDEX the managers of the missionary system are spoken of in these words:—

"The managers who publicly pretend to believe in the possibility of thus converting the world, and boldly assert it to credulous congregations for the sake of securing large contributions for missionary objects, are guilty of the old priestly trick of swindling the people while they laugh in their own sleeves."

Here is a grave mistake. Having known many of these managers and found them honest and honorable, I can but protest against this impeachment of their characters. They are not swindlers, but as sincere as the contributors; even more so on the whole; for the latter, as in other charities, sometimes give merely because it is customary, or because they dislike to say no; while the managers are not only sincerely but heartily devoted to the cause; with as small proportion of exceptions as is to be found among bank directors and other honest classes. I think the foreign mission charity is one of the least wasteful and most useful of the general charities within the limits of the orthodox system. It is liberalizing and rationalizing in its tendency; does something to cultivate the enthusiasm of humanity; something to break the bonds of sect; something to divert attention from ecclesiasticism, dogma, ritual, and turn it to the promotion of education, the spread of knowledge and science, the upward movement of humanity in truth and goodness. It is better than home mission charities, which perpetuate and intensify the spirit of sect, foster religious demagoguism, encourage Phariseism. A dollar devoted to the heathen is more likely to do good than if given to build a church or support a preacher in it; for a good deal of the theology of the churches is fitter for exportation to the semi-civilized or the barbarous than for use at home, where it is more or less outgrown.

It is also a cheap charity; only five millions a year for the 100 millions of Protestants, that is, five cents for each person; while the cost of orthodoxy at home, in Europe and America, is some 300 millions, or three dollars each. Even the tobacco used by Protestants costs some 200 millions a year, or two dollars each; and yet this, in the view of a comprehensive philosophy of human development is not waste, but one of the inferior modes of lifting men out of greater evil and weakness. If the two dollars for tobacco may be patiently and wisely borne, and the three for orthodoxy, the pittance of five cents for the missionary box need not be denounced. Tobacco is likely to live for many generations till gradually eliminated by some mild process of natural selection or survival of the fittest. Orthodoxy may hope to live still longer, in constantly improving forms, till it shall cease to be burdensome to reason or conscience. The missionary system, growing gradually into a broad system of general philanthropy, pervaded by an elevated religious spirit, is likely to survive both. Duff, Livingstone, Colenso and others are already heralds of the better time.

J. T. D.

[Taken out of its connection, the passage commented on in the above temperate and gentlemanly criticism sounds very harsh and unjust. But we had just proved by incontrovertible statistics the impossibility of converting the whole world to Christ; and what we said amounted to this, that whoever, being acquainted with these statistics, should profess to believe in the possibility of such conversion, could not be sincere. Of the managers who make no such professions, we said and implied nothing. Even those who allow themselves to fall into this insincerity may be very earnest and hearty in the missionary cause, since, as we said, the salvation of a single soul would alone warrant all the expense of missions in the eyes of a believer in everlasting punishment. The question is simply this—can a man who knows the actual facts say to the public with honesty that he believes the existing missionary system will really accomplish the conversion of all mankind to Christianity? We would not be uncharitable—still less, unjust. But, by every ordinary rule of judging human conduct, it must be said that such conduct as this is hypocritical. Otherwise it is injustice to say that hypocrisy ever existed anywhere. If the sincerity of any man's speech can ever justly be called in question, it must be called in question in this case.

There is apparently a contradiction between the sentence above cited, even as here explained, and our disclaimer of having imputed "fraudulent management" or "financial corruption" to missionary boards. But this apparent contradiction will disappear on examination of the context. The "fraud" we charge against the missionary system is in the system itself, not in the management of its finances—in the false professions by which the funds are too often obtained, not in any perversion of the funds from missionary objects. This distinction is very simple, wide and deep. A gold-mine company will be a "fraud" upon the public, if the directors know that the mine worked is of no value; yet the directors may appropriate every cent of the company's funds to working the mine. And the directors will be nothing but "swindlers," in the sense in which we used the word, if they pretend to believe in the valuelessness of the mine for the sake of inducing the public to take the company's stock. We accordingly admit that the missionary boards are undoubtedly honest in applying their funds to the support of missions; yet if, for the sake of securing these funds, they profess a belief in the ultimate conversion of the whole world to Christ, they are "swindlers" in the exact proportion that they know what they are about.

No—our "grave mistake," if it exists, lies further back. Admit that the whole world cannot be converted to Christ, and it follows that no well-informed person can sincerely profess to believe in its conversion. There is no dodging this conclusion, if the premises are once conceded. Are we to blame for considering the missionary boards as well informed in the matter, when it is from their published reports that we have derived our own information? Cannot they put two and two together, and make four, just as well as we? Our friend should dismiss his suspicion that we are slandering the missionary boards, either wilfully or innocently, unless he can show that their promise of converting the whole world to Christ can be fulfilled. If they make no such promise (and not all their members make it), they are chargeable with nothing but a wasteful folly that does some incidental good. But if they do make such promises (as every one who has ever attended a missionary meeting knows that some of them do), then they are also chargeable with hypocrisy in addition. If we have made a "grave mistake," it consists in holding that the whole world can never be converted to Christianity. If this position is not mistaken, there can be no mistake in its necessary logical consequences.

We must stand squarely by what we have said, because we believe that it is the truth and that the world needs to know it. It is no part of our religion to see Jesuitism without exposing it. While we believe that the majority of evangelical believers, ministers, missionaries and all, are just as sincere as any one, we also believe that Jesuitism is not dead yet, and that it is not by any means confined to the Catholic Church.—ED.]

MISS WILBURN.

INDIANAPOLIS, Oct. 27, 1871.

EDITOR INDEX:

Dear Sir,—I observe that you have inaugurated a movement for the relief of that unfortunate and lonely but gifted woman, Cora Wilburn. I heartily sympathize with you in this, knowing Miss Wilburn as I do to be one of the purest and most unselfish of women, and gifted as few mortals are with inspirations of sweetest song and finest story. I also know her to be a true, radical humanitarian. This is why she is poor. Could she consent to write such stuff as the popular appetite demands, she could command remunerative engagements from such papers as the Ledger and New York Weekly. Instead of this, she has given her efforts to struggling reform papers without hope of much, if any, pay in money. This by way of preface. Now for a proposition.

Two years ago I purchased of Miss Wilburn a serial story for the Ladies' Own Magazine, that should run through the entire volume for 1870. The title of this story is "LOST AND FOUND—or, Love's Triumph," and it is one of the most beautiful and thrilling of romances, eminently interesting, instructive in its historical and descriptive parts, and abounding in excellent sentiment and sound counsel. Anticipating a large demand for this, we printed an extra edition during the year. A few hundred copies are still unsold. I propose to contribute one hundred copies of the Ladies' Own Magazine for 1871, containing this story complete (besides nearly 400 pages of other matter) to your fund for the relief of Miss Wilburn. The price is $1.50 per copy, but I have thought best to offer it at $1.00 with 15 cents added to prepay postage. Orders may be sent direct to this office; and we will mail the Magazine to the subscribers, and remit the money to you as treasurer of this fund.

Fraternally yours,

M. CORA BLAND.

MY RELIGIOUS CREED.

I believe that Christ was the Son of God;—"Thou art my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." (Mark, 1: 11.) I believe that Christ was God himself;—"And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us." (John 1: 14.)

I believe that Christ was crucified at Golgotha;—"And when they were come unto a place called Golgotha, . . . they crucified him." (Matt. 27: 33, 35.) I believe that Christ was crucified in Egypt—"And Egypt, where also our Lord was crucified." (Rev. 11: 8.)

I believe that Christ was crucified at the third hour;—"And it was the third hour and they crucified him." (Mark, 15: 25.) I believe that Christ was not crucified until after the sixth hour;—"And it was the preparation of the passover, and about the sixth hour, and he saith unto the Jews, Behold your king. . . . Shall I crucify your king?" (John, 19: 14, 15.)

I believe that Christ was three days and three nights in the grave;—"So shall the son of man be three days and nights in the heart of the earth." (Matt. 12: 40.) I believe that Christ was only two days and two nights in the grave;—"And it was the third hour, and they crucified him, . . . It was the preparation, that is, the day before the Sabbath . . . And Pilate . . . gave the body to Joseph. And he . . . laid him in a sepulchre. . . . Now, when Jesus was risen early the first day of the week, he appeared first to Mary Magdalene." (Mark, 15: 25, 42, 44, 45, 46; 16: 9.)

I believe that there were two angels seen by the women at the sepulchre, and that they were standing up;—"And it came to pass, as they were much perplexed thereabout, behold, two men stood by them in shining garments" (Luke, 24: 4.) I believe that there was one angel seen by the women at the sepulchre, and that he was sitting down;—"For the angel of the Lord descended from heaven, and came and rolled back the stone from the door, and sat upon it. . . . And the angel answered and said unto the women, Fear not." (Matt. 28: 25.)

I believe that Christ first appeared to his disciples in a room at Jerusalem;—"And they rose up the same hour, and returned to Jerusalem, and found the eleven gathered together. . . . And as they spake, Jesus himself stood in the midst of them. . . . But they were terrified and supposed that they had seen a spirit." (Luke, 24: 33, 36, 37.) "The same day, at evening, being the first day of the week, when the doors were shut, where the disciples were assembled, . . . came Jesus and stood in the midst." (John, 20: 19.) I believe that Christ first appeared to his disciples on a mountain in Galilee;—"Then the eleven disciples went away into Galilee, unto a mountain where Jesus had appointed. And when they saw him, they worshipped him, but some doubted." (Matt. 28: 16, 17.)

I believe that Christ ascended from Mount Olivet;—"And when he had spoken these things, while they beheld, he was taken up, and a cloud received him out of their sight. . . . Then returned they unto Jerusalem from the mount called Olivet." (Acts, 1: 9, 12.) I believe that Christ ascended from Bethany;—"And he led them as far as to Bethany; and he lifted up his hands and blessed them. And it came to pass that while he blessed them, he was parted from them, and carried up into heaven." (Luke, 24: 50, 51.)

IGNORAMUS.

PARKER PILLSBURY.

ELMWOOD, Peoria Co., Ill., Oct. 30, 1871.

F. E. ABBOT.

Dear Sir,—The waiting, expectant attitude of the public mind on such questions as are discussed in THE INDEX is full of promise, but at the same time it is suggestive of a want not easily supplied, namely, competent preachers of natural religion and a truer social order. While human nature remains what it is, we shall need the personal presence and magnetism of the orator. We need to come together for the interchange of views and sympathies. While 50,000 priests in this land lead off in the beaten paths of bloody superstition, where are the teachers in whose sweet companionship we may roam the dewy fields of free thought?

The field is wide, and the laborers are not within hail of each other. We can count them on the fingers of one hand. Of all the broad field I know of no portion so white to the harvest as this of Central Illinois,—none where the promise of good results is so great to a wise reaper. In moral as in commercial affairs, there are natural centres of work and interchange; and such centres for free religious work, it seems to me, may be found on these prairies. If so, who is equal to the task of rolling away the stone from our sepulchre? Who shall read to us from the open volume of the world, upon which, "with a pen of sunshine or destroying fire, the inspired Present is writing the annals of God?"

These questions are suggested by the recent tour of Parker Pillsbury through Illinois, and some excellent work done by him in this vicinity. After forty years of reformatory work, he seems as fresh and as solemnly enthusiastic as at the first, while with a richer experience and a profounder earnestness his addresses are more powerful than ever before.

I know of no one better fitted for the work spoken of than he, with his almost prophetic clearness of vision; but if his feet are planted elsewhere, how and by whom shall this want in our case be met? The ground surely should be occupied, and that right soon.

Yours most truly,

E. R. BROWN.

FANATICISM.

The annexed paragraphs are from Bishop John's sermon before the Episcopal General Convention, lately held in Baltimore. The text was—"For the Love of Christ Constraineth Us."

Consider that pious pastor of Wurtemberg (Peter Schaeffer) who had two sons whom he devoted to the ministry. The elder, who had gone to the coast of Africa, soon found a grave under that deadly climate. The father immediately writes to the youthful son, then at the missionary institution—"Thy brother is with God. It is time that you thought of Africa. Go ask the institution to permit you to fill the vacancy caused by your brother's death." The youth obeyed with joy. To the Missionary Committee the father writes—"Do not abandon the Gold Coast, though the graves of the missionaries should fill it with dead like the trenches before Sebastopol. Resting on the promise of God, we are more sure to carry the African fortress than the Ilies to conquer the Crimea." He and his sons were not beside themselves. The love of Christ constrained them.

Consider that excellent woman who left all for the missionary field in India. In a few years her little family grew to an age when it was no longer safe to leave them exposed to the surrounding abominations of heathenism. Did she quit her field and return to her former home? No; she took them to the beach, tore them from her heart, placed them in the hands of others to be conveyed away, and, as she sank on the shore in agony of grief, exclaimed—"Blessed Jesus, I do this for Thee!" Truly his love of Christ is above the love of life; stronger than a father's, yea, even than a mother's love.

The heathen mother lays her babe among the rushes of her sacred river to be devoured by the crocodiles; the Christian mother tears hers from her bosom and sends it to be reared by strangers, thousands of miles from its natural protectors. And each does it in the name of religion! Each in her own way makes an unholy sacrifice to a false God.

H.

CARLYLE'S "SARTOR RESARTUS."

I wish to draw the attention of the radical readers of THE INDEX who have not read it to the above work. The style is not so obscure and peculiar as many persons not acquainted with it suppose it to be. After an hour's reading of it the reader will be so rapt and exalted that it will read as simple and plain as an ordinarily constructed work. In some passages the author soars almost to the utmost heights of inspiration, and from what I had heard of "Sartor Resartus" before reading it, I was never so agreeably surprised and delighted with a book in my life. Scribner & Co., New York, issue a nice edition, with a magnificent picture of the author's head. The man who can rise from the perusal of "Sartor Resartus" without the uplifting of all that is grand and God-like in him is too shallow for my comprehension. Will Mr. Abbot kindly allow me to quote a little, as a taste:—

"'But there is no Religion!' reiterates the Professor. Fool! I tell thee there is! Hast thou well considered all that lies in this immeasurable froth-ocean we name LITERATURE? Fragments of a genuine Church Homiletic lie scattered here, which Time will assort: nay, fractions even of a Liturgy could I point out. And knowest thou no Prophet, even in the vesture, environment and dialect of this age? None to whom the God-like had revealed itself through all lowest and highest forms of the Common, and by him been again prophetically revealed,—in whose inspired melody, even in these rag-gathering and rag-burning days, Man's Life again begins, were it but afar off, to be Divine? Knowest thou none such? I know him and name him—GOETHE. But thou as yet standest in no Temple; joineest in no Psalm-worship; feelest that, where there is no ministering Priest, the people perish? Be of comfort! Thou art not alone, if thou hast Faith. Spake we not of a Communion of Saints, unseen but not unreal, accompanying and brother-like embracing thee, so thou be worthy? Their heroic sufferings rise up melodiously together to Heaven out of all lands and out of all times, as a sacred miserere; their heroic actions also, as a boundless, everlasting psalm of triumph. Neither say that thou hast now no symbol of the God-like. Is not God's Universe a symbol of the God-like; is not Immensity a Temple; is not Man's History and Men's History a perpetual Evangel? Listen! and for organ-music thou wilt ever, as of old, hear the Morning Stars sing together."

Again, he says:—

"By what argument does one who can make iron swim assume that therefore he can teach religion?"

In another place, speaking of the "Natural Supernatural," he says in substance;—

"Perhaps to me the miracle of the resurrection of the dead were but natural,—deeper laws of Nature, now first revealed. 'But is not a proper miracle simply a violation of Nature's laws?' several ask. To whom I reply—'What are Nature's laws?'" &c.

To conclude, I advise all who have not read it to read "Sartor Resartus." To me it is a new Gospel, a precious Bible among my many Bibles, which I would not part with for worlds.

THE CHICAGO CONFLAGRATION.

GENESEO, N. Y., Oct. 29, 1871.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir—Your article in the last number of THE INDEX relative to the late destructive fire in Chicago is so much better than many of the commentaries I have met with on that subject, that I can hardly reconcile it to my sense of justice to find fault with it. But I am constrained frankly to avow that I can by no means regard it as unexceptionable. Its faults are, I think, clearly traceable to excited imagination and wonder. But it is in these that the overshadowing superstitions which it is the especial purpose of THE INDEX to counteract and eradicate, had their origin and have their chief ailment. Suppose that by the prompt interposition of a well-supplied fire engine, or by a copious fall of rain, the fire had been limited to the out-building in which it is said to have originated. Would you have been moved to treat of it in the grandiloquent strain you have done? And if so, would you not have provoked ridicule? And yet, a little reflection under the guidance of unbiased reason would surely have sufficed to convince you that all you have so eloquently said of the stupendous catastrophe that ensued, would in the former case have been equally pertinent.

A boy, going to milk a cow in the evening, carried a lamp with him, and set it down in the straw within reach of the cow's heels; and the cow kicked it over and set the straw on fire, and the burning straw communicated the flame to the building.

So far it was but one of those ordinary incidents that are constantly occurring every day. But it happened that there had been a severe and protracted drouth resulting from natural meteorological causes, and from the same causes the prevalence of a very high wind. Hence the rapid and inevitable spread of the flames. This is the whole case, is it not?

And what was there in this to provoke from a reasonable and considerate man a declaration, so formally and solemnly announced, of his belief that "God was in the Fire?"

At most it amounts to an assertion of pantheism—a notion, whether well or ill founded, very innocently entertained by many good men. And I am here reminded of its beautiful suggestion by Coleridge—

"And what if all of animated Nature
Be but organic harps, divinely framed,
That tremble into thought, as o'er them sweep,
Plastic and vast, one intellectual breeze,
At once the soul of each and God of all?"

From the nature of the case, this idea can only be vaguely entertained. One of the deepest thinkers of the age has defined Deity to be "the insoluble problem upon which the mind reposes from the fatigue of suspended judgment." And yet the orthodox bigots seem to imagine that they know all about their God as well as they do about each other. It might serve to check their idle twaddle, if they could accustom themselves to look into the starry heavens and remember that God is the CREATOR OF THE UNIVERSE, to only the visible parts of which our earth bears no greater proportion than a pebble bears to a mountain.

A. C.

There is not a daily London Times published which doesn't contain this and similar advertisements; "A wet nurse wanted—a single woman preferred." The meaning of this is obvious. "A single woman preferred," because she is less likely to be diverted by family obligations and the care of her illegitimate offspring that she designedly neglects from the nursing to which her employer, with a natural selfishness, would desire exclusively to confine her attention. Thus to the crime of murder is to be added that of encouraging the sacrifice of female virtue, as the consequence of the refusal of women of society to perform their natural duties.—Harper's Bazaar.

INDEX TRACTS

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION have published the following tracts, and will publish others of a similar character, if encouraged to do so by the receipt of enough orders to cover the expense:—

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no abler, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Fifteen copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. It gives reliable statistics showing that, at the lowest estimate, this system would take about Forty Thousand Years to convert the world; and quotes the highest authorities proving the utter failure of the Catholics to civilize the Paraguay Indians, and of the Protestants to civilize the Sandwich Islanders, in any true sense of the word. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Fifteen copies One Dollar.

Also, the scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition by PARKER PILLSBURY, entitled "The Sunday Question," is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion without Superstition

First Series, No. 1 to 20.

Second Series, Just Published—

21. Fanaticism: how displayed by well-meaning people in their judgment and action respecting religion in others.
22. Let your Faith honor God, not calumniate Him: reject all testimony that speaks ill of God.
23. Who Wrote It? a proper and useful inquiry when an unreasonable claim is urged on the ground that "it is written."
24. Periodical Prayer: ask when you want to ask; thank when you want to thank; be honest in prayer.
25. Hear the other Side: seek an intelligent faith, instead of blindly following ignorance and prejudice.
26. Man's Duty to God: above all things do not neglect it; but take care, too, not to be misled in regard to it.
27. Penny-wise, Pound-foolish: to claim divine inspiration for unworthy imputation on the divine character.
28. A Touchstone for false Teachers: God certainly gave reason and conscience to be our guides.
29. Justice and Love vs. Mercy: God's actual method better than the supposed "plan of salvation."
30. Prepared to Die: an unveiling of some clerical false pretences.
31. "Even as Others": showing a point of resemblance between the "evangelicals" and those believers whom they stigmatize as "unbelievers."
32. Do Men need Salvation? a look towards God directly, not through the dark-stained church-windows.
33. Unchangeable: will God ever refuse to welcome the repenting and returning sinner?
34. Lost Sinners: men sometimes lose their children; did God ever lose, can he lose, his children?
35. Times and Seasons: two false notions considered; one about Friday, one about Sunday.
36. Do they really believe it? cases where Orthodoxy follows tradition in opposition to Scripture.
37. The Boston Revival and its Leader: methods of operation of Rev. A. B. Earle, professional revivalist.
38. He Rejects the Bible: a false charge refuted, and the opposing truth clearly shown.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, Toledo, Ohio

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Circulars with list of subjects will be sent on application.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

THE TRUE TEMPTATION OF JESUS.

BY PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, OF ENGLAND.

Every one who has read the New Testament is aware that in the first and third Gospels a remarkable story is found (alluded to also in the second Gospel) in which the devil is represented to have assailed Jesus with three special temptations, and to have been repelled by quotation of Old Testament texts. That it is impossible to maintain the literal truth of this account has been reluctantly conceded by writers, who, like the author of "Ecce Homo," are wholly unconcerned to ascertain when, where, by whom, and with what means of knowledge, these narratives were penned. Those who desire to save their credit, try to rid them of a damaging burden by declaring this scene to be allegorical. No spectator is pretended. The idea that Jesus communicated such inward trials to his disciples is contrary to everything which is reported concerning his character: for he is everywhere represented as wholly uncommunicative, self-contained, more or less mysterious, and moving in a separate region of thought and feeling from the disciples. Evidently this story does not express the opinion of the first Christians, while Jesus was as yet believed to be only human, that he, as others, must have had a struggle against temptations, and therefore, against the devil. It is not here intended to point out what is plain of itself, that none of the temptations are worthy of the acumen attributed to the experienced and wily Satan; and are merely puerile in fiction, whether Jesus be imagined as the Second Person of the Divine Trinity, or merely as a great and holy, but human prophet. Here I intend to give prominence to that which I believe to be the fundamental trial of a religious reformer, especially when he attains great ascendancy and commands high veneration. But first I must say, I shall be truly sorry, if any Trinitarian read these pages, and find himself wounded. I do not address him. I argue on the assumption that Jesus was subject to human limitations like all the rest of us, and that it is our duty to criticise him and the story of him, if it be of sufficient importance.

What are the temptations of the prophet, can be no secret in the present day: we see them in the ordinary life of the admired preacher. To be run after by a multitude, to be ministered to by fascinated ladies, to see gray-haired men submissively listening and treasuring up his words,—easily puffs a young preacher into self-conceit. In one who has too much strong sense to be drawn into light vanity, fresh and fresh success inspires, first, the not unreasonable hope or belief that he is fulfilling a great work, and is chosen for it by God (not for his own merit, but because, if a work is to be done, some one must be chosen for it); next, an undue confidence in the truth and weight of his own utterances, an ex-ravagant conviction that whoever resists his word impugns God's truth, and makes himself the enemy of God. In the denunciations of Luther against Zwingle, his own wiser and more temperate coadjutor, in the vehemence of John Knox, in the cruelty of Calvin to Servetus, we see variously developed the same dangerous tendency. If we cast the eye eastward, to more illiterate nations, to those accustomed to revere the hermit and the semi-savage as akin to the prophet, to peoples whose homage expresses itself by prostration, we see the tendency of the prophet to assume a regal and dictatorial mien even in the garb of a half-naked Bedouin. Many an eastern monk or prophet, Syrian, Persian, or Indian, has been obeyed as a prince; some have been attended on by large armies: to some the native king has paid solemn obeisance. In ancient Greece, where philosophy overtopped religion, ascetic philosophers have been accepted as plenipotentiary legislators; in which, no doubt, we see portrayed, on a small scale, the legislative influence of a Buddha, a Confucius, or a Zoroaster. When an Indian prophet found it natural for multitudes to kneel to him or to prostrate themselves, how hard must it have been to accept such homage and retain a sense of human equality—how hard not to think it reasonable that others bow down, and unreasonable that any stand up and argue with the prophet as his equal!

In the Gospels and Acts the habit of prostration among these nations is sufficiently indicated; and we see how it is resented (according to the narrative) by Peter. When Cornelius falls at Peter's feet and does homage (certainly intending respect only, not divine worship), Peter regards it as quite unbecoming from a man to a man. But Jesus is represented as accepting such homage without the least hesitation, and apparently with approval. The cases are not few, nor confined to any one narrative. Matt. viii. 2, "There came a leper and worshipped him." Matt. ix. 18, "There came a certain ruler and worshipped him." Matt. xiv. 33, "They worshipped him, saying, Of a truth thou art the [or a] Son of God." Matt. xv. 25, "Then came the woman and worshipped him, saying, Lord! help me." On this Jesus comments approvingly, "O woman, great is thy faith." Matt. xvii. 14, "There came a certain man, kneeling down to him and saying, Lord! have mercy on my son!" Matt. xx. 20, "There came the mother of Zebedee's children, worshipping him." Matt. xxviii. 9, "They held him by the feet and worshipped him." This is after the resurrection, thereby differing in kind from the rest. The same remark applies to verse 17. We have substantially the same fact in Mark i. 40; v. 6, 22, 33; vii. 25; x. 17. In the last passage the rich young man kneels to Jesus: he was not so represented in Matt. xix. 6. Luke v. 8, "Simon Peter fell down at Jesus' knees." Luke v. 12, "A man full of leprosy fell on his face, and besought Jesus." In Luke vii. an account is given, perhaps not at all authentic. A woman is represented to bathe the feet of Jesus with her tears, and wipe them dry with her long hair, and after that, anoint them with ointment and kiss his feet incessantly. Jesus, according to the narrative, highly applauds her conduct, and avows that "therefore, her sins, which are many, are forgiven." Such conduct on his part is far above criticism, if he was either a person of the Divine Trinity, or a superhuman being, who existed before all worlds and all angels, being himself the beginning of the creation of God. I cannot doubt that the writer, called Luke, believed Jesus to be superhuman, and therefore found no impropriety in the conduct here imputed to him; but I do not understand how any one who regards him as a human being can fail to censure him in the strongest terms, if he believe this account. As I see special grounds for doubting it, (inasmuch as it looks like a re-making of the story reported in Matt. xxvi. 6-13, which it exaggerates), I lay no stress upon it: but even in that other account there is a self-complacency hardly commendable in a mere man. Again, in Luke viii. 20, we read, "the woman fell down before him." She does not fall down in Matt. ix. 22; therefore, here also the story may have been "improved" by credulity. But it is needless to follow this topic further. Suffice it to say, that though we do not know exactly how much to believe, though we have frequent reason to suspect exaggeration, yet the narratives all consistently represent Jesus to have received complacently an unmanly and degrading submission from his followers, such as no apostle would have endured for a moment; and it is hard to believe that such reports could have gained currency, with no foundation at all. If, therefore, we are to criticise Jesus on the belief that he was man, and not God, nor a superhuman spirit, we must admit, I think, that a real and dangerous temptation beset him in this matter. He was prone to take pleasure in seeing men and women profound in their obeisance, prostrate in mind and soul before his superior greatness;—for prostration of the body brings satisfaction to pride, only as it denotes prostration of soul. It is difficult, with these narratives before us, to think that Jesus took to himself that precept which Peter gives to the elders, that they be not lords over God's heritage, but be subject one to another, and clothed with humility, that they may be ensamples to the flock. Indeed, unless we utterly throw away all the narratives, it is hardly too much to say, that this is the very opposite to the portrait of Jesus. If we will accept the theory that he was superhuman, we can justify his immeasurable assumption of superiority; but the fact remains, that in places, too many to reject, he puts himself forward as "lord over God's heritage."

Two classes of facts, presented in the narratives, must be carefully separated. The former is the general superiority asserted by Jesus for himself; the latter, is the special assumption of Messianic dignity. On the latter, there is notoriously an irreconcilable diversity of the fourth gospel from the rest. The writer of the fourth, unquestionably ascribing to Jesus preexistence with God in some mysterious way, and sonship in a sense perfectly unique, represents his Messiahship as notorious to John the Baptist, to Andrew and Philip, from the very beginning, says it was avowed by Nathanael (whoever this was), and preached by Jesus to Nicodemus and to the woman of Samaria. All this is in so flat contradiction to the three first gospels, that nothing historical can be made out of the account; and in trying to attain a true picture of Jesus, I necessarily set aside the fourth gospel as a mischievous romance. Nevertheless, the element which I call an assumption of general superiority, is as complete and persistent in the three first gospels as in the fourth.

Keshub Chunder Sen entitles it "a sublime egotism" in Jesus, to say, "Come unto me, and I will give you rest: take my yoke upon you, and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in spirit." Yet if Luther, or John Knox, or Wesley had said it, we should adduce it in proof that he was eminently lacking in that very grace,—lowliness of spirit,—for which he was commending himself. But is this the only egotism ascribed to him in Matthew? Nay, but in the celebrated beatitudes of the sermon on the Mount, which some esteem the choice flower and prime of the precepts of Jesus, he winds up with, "Blessed are ye when men shall speak evil against you falsely for my sake." He does not say "for righteousness's sake," if the narrative can be trusted. The discourse continues like itself to the end, for in the close he says: "Many shall say to me in that day, Lord! Lord! have we not prophesied in thy name, . . . and then will I profess unto them, I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity." This is, it may be said, a very energetic way of declaring, that no pretence of following in his train as a prophet could compensate for personal iniquity. As such we may accept it: but it remains clear, that he is claiming for himself a position above the human; such as no beauty or truth of teaching could ever command, as rightful from men to a man, to the conscience of those reared in the schools of modern science: while of course, if he claimed to be higher than man, the first reasonable necessity, and therefore his first duty, was to exhibit the proofs of supernatural knowledge and authority. Undoubtedly, the alternative lies open of disbelieving the Evangelist. It may be urged, that the text represents Jesus as also saying that in his name they will claim to have cast out devils and done many wonderful works; but that this is an exaggeration belonging to a later time, and so therefore may the pretensions be, with which it is coupled. Well; so be it; let us then look further.

According to Matt. ix. 6, Jesus claimed power to forgive sin; he brought on himself rebuke for it, but proceeded to justify himself by working a miracle. Whence did his disciples get the idea of his advancing such extravagances, if really he did not go farther than his disciples James and John? Presently after, he is represented as preaching that he is the bridegroom of the Church, in whose presence the disciples cannot mourn, and therefore ought not to fast; but that when he is taken away, then they will fast. How very peculiar and strange a sentiment to invent for him, if it was not uttered! Does it not rather seem to have the stamp of individualism and truth, thoroughly as it is in harmony with the tales of his rejoicing to see men and women kneel before him?

Next when Jesus sends out twelve disciples to say, "The kingdom of heaven is at hand," he is represented to assert, that it shall be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for the house or city which has not received his messenger. Surely, if any one were now to knock at our house door with such a formula of words, and on the strength of it expect to be accepted with the honors of a prophet, only the weak-minded would give him a pleasant reception. Yet no ground whatever appears for believing that there was anything to accredit such messengers then, any more than now: certainly nothing more appears in the narrative, which quite consistently everywhere holds that Jesus regarded the non-reception of his messengers as a supereminent guilt, merely because it was he who sent them.

When it is added, "ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake," we are perhaps justified in esteeming that prediction as an after-invention of popular credulity. But in the same discourse (Matt. x. 23) we alight for the first time on the remarkable phrase, "The Son of Man," afterwards indisputably applied by Jesus to himself. "Ye shall not have gone over the cities of Israel, till the Son of Man be come." No one but Jesus himself ever calls him the Son of Man. Whatever he then meant, the book puts into his mouth yet more of sublime egotism. "Whosoever shall confess me before men," (says he), "him will I confess before my Father which is in heaven: but whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven. He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it. He that receiveth you receiveth me, and he that receiveth me, receiveth Him that sent me." Certainly, when we begin to pare down these utterances, and try to reduce them to something that would not be highly offensive in James or Paul, we seem in danger of cutting away so much that is characteristic, as to impair all confidence in what remains. But unless we are bound to reject the pervading color of the narrative, I feel it not too much to say, that in a mere man the self-exaltation approaches to impiety. What can it concern any of us, that his brother man should "deny him" before our common Father? How suddenly would the honor which we felt for a preacher be turned to grief and disappointment, or even indignation, if we heard him to say, "Blessed is he, whoever shall not be offended in me!" He would fall in our esteem from the highest pinnacle to a very low place, nor could any pretence of "sublime egotism" save him.

In the same chapter in which the last words occur (Matt. xi.) the Evangelist goes on into language not dissimilar to that of the fourth gospel. "All things are delivered unto me of my Father: and no man knoweth the Son but the Father: neither knoweth any man the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him." When it is considered that, although the nucleus of this gospel probably existed before the first century was ended, we have absolutely no guarantee that the text was finally settled, as we now have it, much before the time of Irenæus, toward the close of the second century; no one has a right to be very confident that this passage, so strongly smacking of the doctrines which won ascendancy in that century, was not introduced at a later time. Perhaps the more reasonable course here, is to strike out verse 27 (about the Son and the Father) as foisted upon Jesus by a later generation. What then shall be said of the words which follow, already quoted, "Come unto me, take my yoke on you, and I will give you rest?" I can accept them, if he is God, or a pre-existing Mighty Spirit. I cannot accept them if he was only man: I then do not entitle them sublime at all, but something else.

Something or other to the same effect is for ever cropping up in this narrative of Matthew, which I purposely take as giving a more human representation of Jesus than Luke or John. He is presently reported to say (Matt. xii. 6), "In this place is one greater than the temple. . . . the Son of Man is Lord even of the Sabbath day." Unless his words have been monstrously distorted, he intended to assert that he was himself the Son of Man spoken of by Daniel the Prophet, that he was personally greater than the temple, and was Lord even of the Sabbath-day. Will any one say, that Jesus merely claimed the right possessed by every man to interpret the law of the Sabbath by the dictates of good sense, and that he regarded every pious man as greater than a temple built of stone; and that the egotistic form of his utterance was an accident? In that case it certainly was a highly unfortunate accident, and we may add, an accident often repeated, which generated in his disciples a veneration for him too great for humanity. But accident so systematic is surely no accident at all. If a good man who makes no pretensions is worshipped as a god after his death, he is guiltless: but if a MAN be worshipped as a god, who has made enormous personal pretensions,—and if a decisive weight in the argument for worshipping him is, that he has left us no choice between worship and reprobation, can one who regards the superhuman claims untenable doubt that self-exaltation and monstrous vanity was a deplorable foible in the prophet? I find only two ways of avoiding the disagreeable inference: (1), by the theory of Paul, or some higher theory; (2), by so rejecting all our accounts of his doctrine and miracles alike as untrustworthy, that nothing is left us to trust at all, nothing on which a faithful picture of Jesus can be founded.

From beginning to end the narrative has but one color as regards the self-exaltation of Jesus. Matt. xii., "Behold! a greater than Solomon is here." Matt. xiii., "Many prophets and righteous men have desired to see the things which ye see, and hear the things which ye hear. Blessed are your eyes, for they see; and your ears, for they hear." And what was this so precious instruction? The Parable of the Sower! Surely no sober-minded person can esteem this so highly above all the teaching of Hebrew sages.

But I pass to a new topic in the sixteenth chapter of Matthew,—the anger of Jesus, when he is asked for a sign from heaven. He replies by calling the persons who asked him hypocrites, when evidently, according to the notions of that age and nation, it was a most reasonable and proper request. In fact, the narratives elsewhere represent him as giving them miraculous signs, which are signs from heaven, in abundance; inasmuch that, if he had been represented as here appealing to these signs, and alleging that these very persons had already witnessed them plentifully, his imputation of hypocrisy might have seemed natural. But that is not his line of argument. He says: "A wicked and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign," as though the desire itself were wickedness, "and there shall no sign be given unto it, but the sign of the prophet Jonas." And he left them and departed. Such words refuse a sign not to the individual only, but to the generation. Are we then to believe that he consistently repudiated all pretence of working miracle? That he esteemed the desire of seeing a miracle wrought in confirmation of his pre-eminent claims, to be such a fatuous absurdity, that he had a right to heap contumelious epithets on the head of any one who asked for it? In favor of this opinion, appeal may be made to the epistles of Paul, who does not betray any knowledge whatever that Jesus had wrought miracles. Let us tentatively adopt this view. Then, first, what a heap of gross misrepresentation is put before us in all four narratives if Jesus not only never affected to work miracles, but even vehemently flouted the idea itself and rebuked those who desired it. Next, it will follow that no justification of his high pretensions was even attempted by him, and therefore no denunciation of men for neglect of him was reasonable. It follows that those resolved to justify him must cut out all his denunciations likewise. Who will write for us an expurgated gospel, to let us know what was the true Jesus? Who will convince us, that a history thus garbled can ever be truly recovered, or deserves our intent study?

In the same chapter of Matthew (the sixteenth) the momentous question is proposed to his disciples, "Whom say ye that I am?" According to the narrative, he first gave them the hint what to reply, by a leading question, "Whom do men say that I, the Son of Man, am?" but perhaps that is only a stupid exaggeration of the narrator, who did not see what it would imply. Let us then drop this portion of the words. He feels his way cautiously with the disciples, and sounds them. Simon Peter replies, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the Living God." Again I ask, Is this narrative grossly and delusively false? or may we trust a vague outline? According to it, Jesus is lifted by the reply into a most exalted state: "Blessed art thou, Simon, son of Jonas," says he, "for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven. . . . I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, . . . &c." After this outburst, what is it that we read as a consequence? "Then charged he his disciples that they should tell no man that he was Jesus the Christ."

It seems utterly irrational and unworthy alike of the most High God and of his specially anointed Prophet (if one special Prophet was indeed so promised), that Messiah should come into his nation,—should expect subjection of mind from all around,—should haughtily evade, instead of enlightening, those who mildly inquired into his claims to authority; finally, should sedulously preserve his incognito, and forbid his disciples to tell that he was Messiah. Men may be either convinced or commanded. To convince them you must kindly and candidly answer their difficulties, and allow them to argue against you; you must meet their questions as plainly and honestly as possible, not browbeat or threaten the interrogators, nor marvel over their unbelief and stupidity. You must descend in the argument on to a perfect level with the man whom you desire to convince, and entirely lay aside all airs of authority, even if you have authority. That is one course of proceeding; but it is the very opposite of that imputed to Jesus. But if men are to be commended, if submission is to be required of them, you must make some display of POWER. In that case you seek to convince them, not that a precept is wise, or a doctrine is true, but that you, its enunciator, have a special right of dictation, drawing after it in the hearer a special duty of submission. Of course, those with whom the idea of miracles is inadmissible do not ask for signs from heaven; not the less must they justify the countrymen of Jesus in requiring from him some credentials, when he claimed submission and used a dictatorial tone. If the nation believed miracles to be the marks of Messiah, and was in error, it belonged to Messiah to unteach them the error, and, as one aware of their folly, to take precautions lest miracles be imputed to him. Surely it was quite unjustifiable to require submission from Priests and Pharisees, yet exhibit to them no credentials whatever of the mighty function with which he was invested. If words dropping from the mouth of Messiah were divine commands, which it was impious to dispute, nothing could supersede the public annunciation of his office, and the display of his credentials, whatever they might be. No evasions are here endurable, on the ground of the political danger to be incurred, or the propriety of giving insufficient proof in order to try people's "faith." To say that political danger forbade, is to say that God sent Messiah insufficiently prepared for his work, and afraid to assume His functions publicly. As to trying "faith" by insufficient proof, nothing can be less rightful or more pernicious. If the proof adduced be of the right kind and appropriate, it cannot be excessive, but may be defective; and if defective, it is a cruel trap, as if designed to lead honesty astray. The only plausibility in this notion rises from confusion of truths which we ought to see by light from within, with truths which can only be established from without. No man can know by his inward faculties that a Messiah is promised from heaven, nor what will be the external marks of Messiah. False Messiahs had already come. To accept lightly any one as Messiah was the height of imprudence, and certainly could not be commended as pious. Under such circumstances, to dissemble Messiahship, and work upon susceptible minds by giving them evidence necessarily imperfect, was conduct rather to be imputed to a devil, than to a prophet from God, if done with serious intent. Those who defend it plead that the evidence was moral, and did not need external proof. If so, on the one hand full freedom of investigation was needed, not authority and browbeating; on the other, this alleges external proof to be worse than superfluous,—to be in fact misleading; so that to plead for its "insufficiency" as a needful trial of faith is a gross error. If external evidence was wholly inappropriate, the producing of that which you concede to be insufficient does but tend to confuse and mislead the simple-hearted, and cause unbelief in the strong-headed. But if external evidence is admirable and appropriate at all for faith to rest upon, then it ought to be in quantity and quality sufficient to make the faith reasonable and firm. If only internal light is to the purpose of faith, and external evidence was not wanted for Messiah, then neither was an authoritative Messiah wanted at all; that is, a teacher to whom we should submit without conviction; then it was right to claim that Messiah would convince by argument and reply to questions; would invite question or opposition, not dictate and threaten; then we have to sweep away the greater part of the four Gospels as a false representation of Messiah. Whatever else may have been true, one thing is certainly false,—that God sent a special messenger to teach authoritatively, and that the messenger thus sent forbade his disciples to publish his character and claims.

From narratives so disfigured by false representation, as every one is obliged to confess them who does not believe the miracles, and seeks to defend Jesus by remoulding the accounts of him; how can any one be blamed for despairing to arrive at accurate and sound knowledge concerning his character and teaching? What right has any one to expect to recover lost history, or to think worse of his brother if he regard the effort to be waste time? Yet if I were to say, I seem to myself to know nothing of Jesus, I should speak untruly; for in the midst of the obscurity and the inconsistencies of the narratives, there are some things unvarying, many things very hard to invent, and others unlikely to be invented, yet easily admitting explanation, if we reason about Jesus as we do about every other public teacher or reformer. The details of doctrine are often untrustworthy, but the current, the broad tendencies, the style and tone of the teacher, seem to have made too strong an impression to be lost, though round them has been gathered a plentiful accretion of mistake and fable. In outline we must say that the first peculiarity of the preacher was, that he did not comment upon the law and prophets, but spoke dictatorially, dogmatically, as with authority—a thing quite right and proper, while only moral truth is taught, which makes appeal to the conscience of the hearer. But the Jews, accustomed like the modern English to nothing but comment and deduction from a sacred book, were apt to inquire of Jesus by what right he spoke so confidently, and paid so little deference to the learned. On one occasion he is said to have given a very fair reply, to the effect that they had listened to the preaching of John the Baptist, without asking his authority. "If John might preach to you dogmatically, why may not I?" was the substance of that argument. But it is clear that numbers of honest, sincere Jews, impressed by the moral weight in these preachings, had begun to inquire whether this was not a renewal of divine prophecy, whether divine prophets must not have some recognizable note of their mission, other than the influence of their doctrine on the human conscience; whether, in fine, Jesus might not be the expected Messiah. This was a very anxious question, especially since delusive Messiahs had appeared; but it was a question that Jews were sure to make, and the three narratives before us, defective as they are, persuade me that it was made, both in private talk, and in direct interrogation to Jesus.

Now if we accept to the full the traditional Jewish belief of what Messiah was to be (which falls short of the dignity ascribed to him by Christians), it is incredible that after commencing his public functions he should remain ignorant of his being Messiah, or need confirmation from his disciples or from others. But if Jesus had little trust in learned Rabbis or traditional doctrine, he may have had a very vague and imperfect belief as to what Messiah was to be; and the idea that he himself was Messiah may not have at all occurred to him, until after he had experienced the zeal of the multitude, and was aware that a rumor was gone abroad among the people, that "a great prophet was arisen," and that some said that he was the Messiah. Can any one study his character as that of a man, subject to all human limitations, and not see, that the question, "Am I then possibly the Messiah?" if at all entertained, instantly became one of extreme interest and anxiety to Jesus himself? Indeed from the day that it fixed itself upon him for permanent rumination his character could not but lose its simplicity. Previously he thought only, "What doctrine is true morality? What are the crying sins of the day? But now his own personality, his own possible dignity, became matters of inquiry; and the inquiry was a Biblical one. He was brought hereby on to the area of the learned commentator, who studies ancient books to find out what has been promised and predicted about a Messiah. An unlearned carpenter, however strong and clear-minded while dealing with a purely moral question, was liable to lose all his superiority and be hurtfully entangled when entering into literary interpretation. Wholly to get rid of traditional notions was impossible, yet enough of distrust would remain, to embarrass fixed belief and produce vacillation. Nothing is, then, more natural than that the teacher should desire to know what was the general opinion concerning him, should be pleased when it confirmed his rising hopes, should be elated when Simon Peter declared him to be Messiah, and should bless his faith, even if not with the extravagance of giving him the keys of the kingdom of heaven; finally, should be displeased with himself and frightened at his own elation, and, in order to repair his error, should charge his disciples to tell no one that he was Messiah; not that he desired to keep the nation in ignorance, but because he was himself conscious of uncertainty. After this his conduct could not be straightforward and simple.

Such is the only reasonable interpretation which I have ever been able to see of this perplexed and perplexing narrative, which is not likely to have grown out of nothing. Jesus came into a false position from that day, and of necessity (as I think) his whole character must have changed for the worse. Thenceforth, the dogmatism which had been a mere form of teaching, and had involved arrogance only in appearance, changed into definite and systematic personal assumption. It is not likely that he began it so early, or ever carried it so far, as even the narrative of Matthew pretends; for as a caricaturist exaggerates every peculiarity of a face, making its prominence more prominent, so does tradition deal with the popular hero. I pretend not to know how much is exactly true; but it comes before me as a certain fact, that the true temptation of Jesus was the whisper made to him, "Are not you possibly the Messiah?" and by it the legendary devil overcame him. That whisper has cost to Europe an infinite waste of mind and toil, no end of religious wars, cruelties, injustices, anathemas, controversies, without bringing any sure advance of religious truth to mankind. How much more convulsion of hearts and entanglement of intellects, how much of violent political upturnings are inevitable, before European nations can now become able to learn that to think freely is a duty, and that religion is spiritual and rational, not magical and supernatural?

THE MEETING OF GERMAN PHYSICIANS AND NATURALISTS IN INNSBRUCK.

[From "Nature," Nov. 4, 1869.]

From the eighteenth to the twenty-fourth of September last the little town of Innsbruck wore an air of unwonted bustle and excitement. Its population, already augmented by the usual throng of Summer tourists, was swelled by the advent of somewhere about eight hundred additional visitors—professors, doctors, directors, men of all science, often with their wives and daughters, who had come from all parts of Germany to attend the forty-third Meeting of the German Naturalists and Physicians. These meetings resemble those of our own British Association, though they differ in several very characteristic respects. One of the first contrasts to strike an Englishman is the entire absence of private hospitality. Everybody, so far as I can learn, is in private lodgings or in a hotel; and there are no such things as dinner-parties. Although our own customs in these respects are certainly very pleasant, there can be no doubt that the German fashion leaves the visitors more freedom, and allows them much more opportunity of seeing and talking with the friends they most wish to meet. With us it is no easy matter to get together a party of chemists, or geologists, or physiologists, to hold a social gathering after the labors are over. We are all either staying with friends, or invited to dinner, or engaged in some way. But at the German meetings such social reunions are one of the distinguishing features. One o'clock in the day brings with it the necessity for dining, and numerous dinner parties are improvised there and then; friends of like tastes, who have not met perhaps for a year before, adjourn to a restauration or kaffee-haus, and while eating the meal have a pleasant opportunity of comparing notes, and discussing questions which have in the interval arisen.

Another feature of contrast is in the length of time devoted to the sitting of the sections. At the British Association the sections open their sittings at eleven in the forenoon; and the work goes on steadily all day without intermission till four or five o'clock in the afternoon. But, in Germany, the sittings commence as early as eight A. M., and are frequently over by ten or eleven o'clock, leaving the rest of the day for some short after-dinner excursion, or for general miscellaneous intercourse among the members. In fact, the German meetings are designed less for the purpose of bringing forward new scientific work, than with the view of affording to men of science opportunities of becoming personally acquainted with each other, and of discussing the value and bearing of recent contributions to knowledge. Hence, the papers which are brought before the sections contain, to a large extent, outlines, summaries or notices of recent researches, and exhibitions of books, maps, memoirs, specimens, experiments, &c., which have recently attracted notice.

In our British Association gatherings, there is probably more hard work than in those of our German brethren, and I dare say there is as much opportunity for sociality as suits our national temperament. For our Association is meant not merely to promote a friendly intercourse among scientific men, but to be a kind of propagandist for the advancement of science through the general community. So we make a compromise between sober, serious, hard work for science on the one hand, and unrestrained festivities on the other. The German meetings keep less prominently before them the scientific culture of the world outside, and aim rather at the strengthening of the hands of the individual worker.

From the papers read at the different sections; from the discussions which they elicited; and still more perhaps from the public addresses on subjects of general interest given to the whole assembled meeting, one could gather some suggestive traits of the present current of thought in at least one great section of the cultivated society of Germany. What specially struck me was the universal sway which the writings of Darwin now exercise over the German mind. You see it on every side, in private conversation, in printed papers, in all the many sections into which such a meeting as that at Innsbruck divides. Darwin's name is often mentioned, and always with the profoundest veneration. But even where no allusion is specially made to him, nay, even more markedly, where such allusion is absent, we see how thoroughly his doctrines have fermented the scientific mind, even in those departments of knowledge which might seem at first sight to be furthest from natural history. "You are still discussing in England," said a German friend to me, "whether or not the theory of Darwin can be true. We have got a long way beyond that here. His theory is now our common starting-point." And so, as far as my experience went, I found it.

But it is not merely in scientific circles that the influence of Darwin is felt and acknowledged. I do not think it is generally known in England, that three years ago, when, after the disastrous war with Prussia, the Austrian Parliament had assembled to deliberate on the reconsolidation of the empire, a distinguished member of the Upper Chamber, Professor Rokitsansky, began a great speech with this sentence:—"The question we have first to consider is, is Charles Darwin right or no?" Such a query would no doubt raise a smile in our eminently unspeculative houses of legislation. But surely never was higher compliment paid to a naturalist. A great empire lay in its direst hour of distress, and the form and method of its reconstruction was proposed to be decided by the truth or error of the theory of Darwin. "The two men," said one able physician of Vienna to me (himself, by the way, a North German), "who have most materially influenced German thought in this country are two Englishmen—George Combe and Charles Darwin."

There was another aspect of the tone of thought at Innsbruck, which could not but powerfully impress a Briton. Although we were assembled in the most ultra-Catholic province of Catholic Austria, there was unbridled freedom of expression on every subject.

In an address on recent scientific progress, Helmholtz thus expressed himself—"After centuries of stagnation physiology and medicine have entered upon a blooming development, and we may be proud that Germany has been especially the theatre of this progress—a distinction for which she is indebted to the fact that among us, more than elsewhere, there has prevailed a fearlessness as to the consequences of the wholly known Truth. There are also distinguished investigators in England and in France, who share in the full energy of the developments of the sciences, but they must bow before the prejudices of society, and of the church, and if they speak out openly, can do so only to the injury of their social influence. Germany has advanced more boldly. She has held the belief, which has never yet been belied, that the full Truth carried with it the cure for any injury or loss which may here and there result from partial knowledge. For this superiority she stands indebted to the stern and disinterested enthusiasm which, regardless alike of external advantages and of the opinions of society, has guided and animated her scientific men."

This liberty of expression, however, seemed sometimes apt to wear not a little of the aspect of a mere wanton defiance of the popular creed. Yet it was always received with applause.

In an address on the recent progress of anthropology, Karl Vogt gave utterance to what in our country would be deemed profanity, such as no man, not even the most free-thinking, would venture publicly to express. Yet it was received, first with a burst of astonishment at its novelty and audacity, and then with cries of approval and much cheering. I listened for some voice of dissent, but could hear none. When the address, which was certainly very eloquent, came to an end, there arose such a thunder of applause as one never hears save after some favorite singer has just sung some well-known air. It was a true and hearty encore. Again and again the bravos were renewed, and not until some little time had elapsed could the next business of the meeting be taken up. Not far from where I was standing, sat a Franciscan monk, his tonsured head and pendant cowl being conspicuous among the black garments of the swains. He had come, I dare say, out of curiosity to hear what the naturalists had to say on a question that interested him. The language he heard could not but shock him, and the vociferation with which it was received must have furnished material for talk and reflection in the monastery.

Voices from the People.

"I am very much troubled that I have not received the last two numbers of THE INDEX. As I have recently come home, I thought you might perhaps have lost my address; and so I write to you in order to tell you to please to send my paper to — instead of —. I do not know what to do without it, for I do not find anything else that meets my views so well, and I am actually starving for it. I live two miles from the post-office, and every time any one goes, I tell them to ask for my INDEX. I do not like to trouble you, but am afraid to wait longer, thinking that you may be sending my papers to my old address."

"We have been taking THE INDEX since it first started, and think we cannot do without it. We should be glad to take a share, at least, in the $50,000; but not feeling able to do so, we can only hope that there are enough among the friends of religious freedom who are able, so that the enterprise may not prove a failure. I had rather all our other papers should stop. Many of the pieces are worth the year's subscription. I could not be induced to exchange the calm trust I have in God's love and goodness for all the warmth of the Christian religion, and its full assurance of immortality."

"We find THE INDEX an essential in our plan of salvation," which is summed up in the following formula—Knowledge of and obedience to the truth. THE INDEX is faithful in the giving of the first; the application depends on ourselves. As you are aware, I am a Spiritualist; but as your position is such an honest one, and also essential to guard us against a too credulous acceptance of some beliefs that are very questionable, as well as an attack on the enemy in one of his most strongly entrenched positions, we bid you God-speed in the conflict for truth, impartial justice, and freedom."

"The dignified character of your precious little paper and the fairness with which the subjects (both for and against Free Religion) are treated, has been a great pleasure to us and the few liberal families in this place. We generally meet on Sunday afternoons at one or the other's house, and read something from your paper and other liberal productions. We all wish your society success, and every chance of increasing its circulation will be cheerfully attended to."

OF THE IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL.

BY SIR JOHN DAVIES.

If then all souls, both good and bad, do teach,
 With general voice, that souls can never die;
 'Tis not man's flattering gloss, but Nature's speech,
 Which, like God's oracle, can never lie.

But how can that be false, which every tongue
Of every mortal man affirms for true?
Which truth has in all ages stood so strong,
That, loadstone-like, all hearts it ever drew.

For not the Christian or the Jew alone,
The Persian or the Turk, acknowledge this;
This mystery to the wild Indian known,
And to the Cannibal and Tartar is.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.

The Association having resumed the publication of The Index, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 26, 1872. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the cash on hand. It is therefore desired that all shares be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

Among the "communications" in our present issue will be found an article with the above caption which complains of a statement we made some weeks ago that we had "little respect for Unitarianism left." For reasons unnecessary to explain we have been unable to reply to this article before; but we will do so now.

We did not say we had little respect left for Unitarians, but for Unitarianism. Our correspondent would have understood our meaning, doubtless, if this distinction had not been overlooked. For Unitarians themselves we entertain exactly as much respect as we think them individually entitled to by their characters and lives; and we are glad to say that we know no Christian sect that stands higher in point of average moral excellence. With so many warm personal friends among them, it would be ungrateful, ungracious, and untrue to hint the contrary.

But Unitarianism, regarded as a phase of Christianity, is false to the great Christian principle of Authority, since it professes to believe in Reason; while, regarded as a phase of Rationalism, it is false to the great rationalistic principle of freedom of thought, since it professes to believe in the authority of the "Lord Jesus." We judge it by what it says collectively, and pay no heed at all to what this or that private Unitarian says of it. All the Unitarian Conferences, National or Local, assert at the same time their devotion to Freedom and to Christianity, and thus present the humiliating spectacle of a divided allegiance. They bow humbly to the great Christian Church, crying—"Yes, we acknowledge your Master, Christ!" and they bow with equal humility to the spirit of the age, crying—"Yes, we acknowledge your Master, Reason!" This is the actual position of the Unitarian denomination; and there is not a clear intellect in the world that can look upon it with respect.

We know there are many young Unitarian ministers who will vehemently protest that Unitarianism is purely rationalistic, because they are so. It avails nothing. They allow themselves to be used as servants by a sect that refuses to be purely rationalistic, re-affirming its submission to "the Lord Jesus Christ" on every possible occasion. It is sad enough to see brave and earnest young men cheating themselves with the delusion that they can make Unitarianism free and rationalistic. Whoever hitches his little row-boat to the Great Eastern will go the Great Eastern's way. He will never make the Great Eastern go his way. We never had such a conceit of our own influence as to fancy that. When the National Unitarian Conference declared for the "Lord Jesus," we left it; and when the whole denomination declared for the National Conference, we left the denomination too. If our little wherry goes down in mid-ocean, so be it. Our boat is at least our own; and if wreck on the open sea is to be the price of freedom, it is not too much to pay. We have better business than being dragged in the Great Eastern's wake.

We do not doubt that "Unitarians have an important work to do." Every person has. We regard our own work as important also. Part of it is to point out the inherent weakness of the Unitarian position, and that of every other position which contradicts freedom. The chains that bind the human mind seem to us the worst evil that can afflict it; and whether they are of iron or gold—whether they cut into the naked flesh, as with the Catholics, or whether they are padded with wool, as with the Unitarians,—is a point of small consequence. The latter recognize a limit to their freedom of thought in the sayings of Jesus; they accept these as the absolute, revealed truth of God: and, as a necessary consequence, they dare not think beyond them. What matters it if the Unitarians are freer than the Evangelical sects? They still have their creed in the "Lordship" of Jesus over the human mind—a creed which the utmost efforts of the Unitarian "radicals" have only riveted tighter on the denomination's neck. It is the work of thorough liberals (and we deem it one of vast importance) to protest against creeds and mental fetters of every kind; and we cannot suppress this protest because personal friends hug their fetters to their hearts. The issue between Christianity and Freedom is distinctly made. On one side or the other must every one take his stand, or else involve himself in contradiction.

If it is doubted whether our allegation is true that Unitarianism is incompatible with perfect freedom, the subjoined document will be pertinent evidence in the case. It will show that we speak from experience. A majority of the Unitarian society in Dover, N. H., notwithstanding we had avowedly stepped "outside of Christianity," desired still to retain us as their minister; and on their promise to form an Independent Society we gladly consented. The minority of the Unitarian Society, with the sympathy and active aid of the Boston Unitarian leaders, applied to the Supreme Court of New Hampshire for an injunction forbidding us to hold services in the Society's church. The case attracted no little attention. The Court at last granted the following injunction:—

STRAFFORD SS. SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT,
December Law Term, 1868.

Sam'l Hale et als. vs. Charles E. Everett et als.

Upon hearing the parties and their proofs,
It is Ordered —

That the prayer of said Bill be granted with costs taxed at one hundred and fifty-three dollars sixty-one cents:

And that said Jasper H. York, George L. Folsom and Carl H. Horsch, wardens of said First Unitarian Society of Christians in Dover, and all other wardens and members of said Society, be jointly and severally strictly enjoined and forbidden to hire, employ, allow, suffer, or permit said Francis E. Abbot, or any other person, to preach and inculcate in the meeting-house of said Society doctrines subversive of the fundamental principles of Christianity, as generally received and holden by the denomination of Christians known as Unitarians:

Or to employ, suffer or permit to preach in said meeting-house any person who rejects Christianity altogether, or who teaches that, as a system of religion, Christianity is partly true and partly false:

Or who preaches and inculcates a disbelief in the doctrine of the Lordship and Messiahship of Jesus Christ, as taught by him in the New Testament Scriptures:

Or a disbelief in Jesus Christ as the great Head of the Church, or of his Divine Mission and Authority as a religious teacher, as thus taught by him :

Or who preaches and inculcates a denial of the doctrine that the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament do contain a Divine Revelation, given by Inspiration of God, and containing a sufficient and perfect rule of faith and practice :

And that said Francis E. Abbot, and all and every other person or persons, be forever strictly enjoined and forbidden to occupy said meeting-house of said society, for the purpose of preaching and inculcating said disbeliefs, denials, and doctrines, herein before specially prohibited to be taught therein, and every and all other doctrine or doctrines subversive of the fundamental principles of Christianity, as generally received and holden by the denomination of Christians known as Unitarians.

IRA PERLEY, Chief Justice.

Attest: DANIEL HALL, Clerk.

Of the two Unitarian papers, the Christian Register printed a record of the case without comment of any sort; while the Liberal Christian, at that time edited by Rev. W. T. Clarke, distinctly approved the action of the Court. Not a word of protest was ever publicly uttered, so far as we know, by any Unitarian minister, prominent or otherwise. On the contrary, the whole denomination seemed to acquiesce in the decree as just and right. Yet this decree is as bigoted and illiberal, as flagrant a violation of the rights of free thought and free speech, as any that can be produced.

We felt, and feel, no ill-will against any one on account of this decree. But what wonder that we have "little respect left for Unitarianism?"

Mr. Pillsbury's tracts on "The Sunday Question" have been all sold; but a new edition will speedily be issued. All orders for this tract not yet filled will be filled as soon as possible.

CONVENTIONS.

At the last annual meeting of the Free Religious Association it was understood that the plan, successfully inaugurated last year, of holding public conventions under the auspices of the Association in different parts of the country, would be continued. The Executive Committee have accordingly arranged for two Conventions to be held as follows:

At Detroit, Michigan, beginning Thursday evening, December 7th, and continuing through Friday, the 8th.

At Syracuse, N. Y., beginning Monday evening, December 11th, and continuing through Tuesday, the 12th.

These Conventions will be attended by the President and the Secretary of the Association, and by other members of the Executive Committee and distinguished friends of the Free Religious movement. Interesting topics, including some of the most vital questions of the day bearing on the relations of Religion to Free Thought, will be presented for discussion. Local friends are making earnest and hospitable preparations for the meetings. It is hoped and expected that attendance will not be merely local, but that people will be drawn to the conventions from the towns in the vicinity. Let the friends of free inquiry and of rational, unsectarian, and practical religion, be on the alert and gather in large numbers to take counsel together and to encourage and stimulate each other to more faithful endeavors in the cause of religious emancipation and progress. Let honest opponents also come to convince or be convinced. The hour is ripe for free and fair discussion of these greatest themes of thought and life.

Further particulars as to subjects and speakers will be given in the daily papers of Detroit and Syracuse previous to the conventions.

THE RIVAL FAITHS.

In a London book-store I found myself standing at a counter on which lay several of the recently published works on the Buddhist religion. There were Alabaster's "Wheel of the Law," containing his interesting little book, "The Modern Buddhist;" Samuel Beal's "Catena of Buddhist Scriptures from the Chinese;" "Buddhagoshā's Parables," with Max Mueller's translation of the "Dhammapadam" as an introduction; the "Pand-namah," or "Book of Counsels," and other specimens of the literature that is now interesting the modern religious world. The bookseller, an intelligent man well acquainted with his wares, in reply to my remark on the revival of interest in the ancient faith, said—"Yes, it is remarkable what a stir it makes. It seems as if Buddhism was to be the religion of the future, if the future is to have a religion." The remark set me thinking on the advantages and disadvantages of such a condition of things. The train of thought was much too long and too complicated to be reported here, and the readers of THE INDEX would certainly decline to follow it. But one or two suggestions may not be out of place even here.

It is plain that there would be no advantage in substituting one corrupted and decaying faith for another corrupted and decaying faith. Nothing would be gained by exchanging one kind of formalism, one species of dogmatism, one mode and fashion of superstition, for an older one. Romanism as it exists is a discouraging and deplorable thing; Protestantism, in its present condition, is a phenomenon exasperating to the instructed and the rational mind. But Buddhism as found in the regions it has occupied for ages is no pleasanter an object of contemplation. The heart sinks as it meditates on the ceremonial tricks, the ritual punctilios, the speculative whimsies and the pious prestidigitations of the Christendom we see about us; but it is not elevated by the information that Buddhists in Asia keep a tally of marks, from day to day, of each person's merit and demerit,—setting off dirty bowls and plates against charitable cups of tea, cancelling a scolding tongue by giving a piece of wood for a coffin, and balancing the killing of a child, which counts one hundred bad marks, by presenting burial boxes to two neighbors and burying in the ground four bones that were waiting to rejoin the ghost which had unwillingly left them behind. You cannot make superstition to be anything but what it is, by giving it a different name. Call it Buddhist, Brahminical, Hebrew, or Christian, it is the same thing still, neither better nor worse. If it is anywhere worse, it is in modern times, among modern people. Free Religion will have none of it, however it be christened or hallowed. If weak minds depend on it, or foolish minds take comfort in it, or cunning minds affect to believe it necessary for the untaught, so much the more heartily do the rational minds detest it, and resolve that its influence shall be contracted and its power broken. A deeper concern than the prevalence of any particular religion is prevalence of rational religion. The vital question is not whether Christianity or Buddhism is to be the religion of the future, whether Tritheism or Theism is to be the ruling theory, whether the conquering faith is to wear on its forehead the name of Jesus or some other name powerful for the moment to conjure by; but whether religion is to be made subservient to intellectual and moral laws. In a word, it is whether religion is to be in the true sense of the word scientific.

In Buddhism I have small interest and smaller faith. That it will ever have a large following,—will ever make disciples in any considerable numbers among the cultivated or the uncultivated classes,—will ever gain access to the moral or spiritual sympathies of earnest or thoughtful minds in the Western world, I do not in the faintest degree believe, hope or desire; nor do I imagine that a single sensible man believes, hopes or desires so wild a thing. But if the publication and dissemination of Buddhist writings, of books like those named in the beginning of this article, of tracts like the "Path of Virtue" noticed by Mr. Higginson in the June number of the Radical, or the "Book of Counsels" which has not had the advantage of such noble advertisement,—could convince "Christians," as they surely will, that they enjoy no monopoly of moral or religious truth; that their best ideas and purest principles are shared by older and equally impressive faiths; that some of their most exalted beliefs are borrowed from people whom they call heathen and torture with ineffectual missionary work; that their rituals and litanies are but copies of ancient observances and echoes of primeval petitions; that the very story of their Founder and Head is paralleled almost word for word and incident for incident in the wonderful legend of Buddha; and that the historical development of their religion was faithfully and literally rehearsed in Asia long before the drama of their own church began or was meditated;—if, we say, effects like these could follow, as they will, and must, and do follow from an acquaintance with these crude and strange, but most interesting and impressive Scriptures, a long stride would be taken towards the position from which an unprejudiced historical survey is obtainable. A vast pile of intellectual and sentimental prejudice is removed, and the possibility is reached of arranging the preliminaries, at least, of an honest treaty between the educated human mind and the problems of religious faith. At present no such treaty can be entered into or thought of. The few who sincerely propose it and who modestly suggest the preliminaries of it pass for visionaries who overlook the conditions of organized and organizing thought, or for fanatical partisans of some rudimentary faith, which from sheer mental perversity, ignorantly and defiantly, perhaps knavishly, they adopt, glorify and manipulate to suit their purposes. A little acquaintance with the historical and ethical relations which the religions hold the one towards the others will correct that injustice and increase the number of persons who pray and work, not for the triumph of their doctrinal prejudices, but for the establishment of religious truth.

TAMMANY.

Hercules has succeeded in turning the river of Reform into the Augean stables. The hope that the filth of Tammany will not much longer breed moral pestilence among the people is rapidly receiving confirmation. We never doubted that this would sooner or later be the upshot of the matter; but we did doubt whether the noses of the New York public had yet been sufficiently outraged to ensure prompt action. There never were such iron-clad noses before. For years the rest of the nation have put their handkerchiefs to their faces at the bare mention of New York, and rushed for the windows; but your imperturbable New Yorker smiled sardonically, and went down town to his office. The smell was bad—he did not dispute that; but then there was "money in it." Now, having discovered that the "money in it" was not for him, but for Tweed and his gang, he has suddenly discovered the putridity in which he dwelt. Pocket, nose, conscience—that has been the order of his sensations. His nose and his conscience were bomb-proof until his pocket was hit. There is plenty of pluck and sense and will in this Reform movement; but, cynical as it sounds, we see little enough virtue in it.

Has not all this dishonesty been notorious for years? How many really cared for it till the taxes became unendurable? How many felt that they were personally responsible, as citizens, for the wrong that the city permitted and therefore did? Have the churches ever taught that your integrity and mine is compromised by the action of our associates, if we stand by unprotesting when they offer violence to the Just or Right? Is it any part of Christian morality that the individual is polluted by society's filth, unless he puts forth every energy to clean it away? No! The moral solidarity of man—the common conscience of the community—the law that every man shares the social corruption in which he acquiesces by his silence,—these are ideas of a higher than Christian ethics; and they teach that, in a dishonest community or organization, no member is honest who shirks all responsibility for the dishonesty of his associates.

It is the saddest aspect of this metropolitan infamy, that no considerable number of persons felt at all troubled by its disgrace till the public credit was endangered. The protest against the villainy of the Ring has been commercial, not moral. The devil of Success has drawn all worship to himself. The gospel of self-respect is despised. Whoever is more solicitous about his personal honor or integrity than about the prosperity of his interests, is condemned as an impracticable, a lunatic, a fool, by nine out of every ten men you meet. New York is no worse than the rest of the world. The moral life of modern society rests on no high or pure principle; nor will it, till the enormous shell of Christianity has found its Sherman. Men are blind, stone-blind, to the paralyzing influence exerted over the public conscience by its purely sentimental morality. We charge directly home upon the Christian Church the ultimate responsibility for the prevailing ethical rottenness; for it professes to teach men virtue, while it knows nothing and says nothing about virtue's highest laws.

Christianity inculcates love; what has it to say of justice? Self-denial, mercy, forgiveness, submission, faith,—of these it tells; but what about the self-respect that bids men die rather than stoop,—the fidelity to truth that bids them doubt rather than believe,—the reverence for equity that bids them put aside all feeling in the cool, unbiassed weighing of another's claims,—the magnificent pride that bids them cut all ties, at all costs, rather than be party to a wrong,—the stern, grand sense of character that bids them scorn the mean, the grasping, the false, the cowardly, the belittling? This is the stuff out of which virtue is made—the stuff that makes noble men and sublime States; and the spirit of it is a stranger to the churches.

Yet this spirit alone can create a public morality that shall cut under public corruption by giving men nobler objects in life than what the world calls success. Mankind have broken the old theological ropes that once tightly bound their limbs; but they are still stiff and cramped, their circulation is stopped, and their backbones are crooked. Freedom of soul—freedom from warped ideals and debased conceptions—can alone be the nursing-mother of a truer and more virtuous civilization. Look where you please for a remedy that shall cleanse the leprous blood of our large cities—you will find none but in the principles and ideas of Free Religion; and if there is no hope of applying this remedy, the patients are incurable. Unless a purer philosophy of life shall set up grander objects of ambition before our young men, and infuse a nobler spirit into them, they will be catspaws of Tammanies to the end of the chapter. The dynasty may change; the monarchy will abide.

Believing this, and believing that Christianity can never impart a nobler spirit than its own, we are willing to incur the reproach of fanaticism in the cause of a better faith. Quietism is more decorous, more dignified, more comfortable than agitation; but it is by agitation alone that new ideas are lodged in unwilling minds. Ungracious as it seems to assail the venerable and time-hallowed superstitions of Christianity, the moral state of society which is revealed, not only in the frauds of the Tammany Ring, but lamentably more in the actual causes of the present protest against it, is a loud summons to every man who believes in the value of pure and high principles to labor for their dissemination among the people. While we are glad that the prospect of municipal bankruptcy and exasperation at endless depletion of private purses have sufficed to waken the people's wrath against their masters, we see no hope of a stable reform until a new and higher code of moral laws has come to command the reverence of mankind. The churches do not teach either civic virtue or the highest type of private virtue; and it is time that men saw and acknowledged a morality higher than the recognized codes of commerce, of society, and of the Christian Church.

F. R. A. CONVENTIONS.

In another column will be found the official notice of two public conventions which are soon to be held at Detroit and Syracuse, by arrangement of the Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association. These conventions have been necessarily deferred till later in the season than those of last year, but perhaps the time will prove quite as auspicious. A third, which it was hoped to hold at Chicago, has had of course to be abandoned this year. This secret, by the way, which is now in an unguarded moment divulged, will doubtless be seized by the special Providence theologians as presenting the clearest explanation yet given why Chicago was burned. Perhaps they will warn Syracuse and Detroit against tempting a like fate. But the Free Religious Association proposes to go on, nevertheless, and hold conventions wherever they will find a welcome, and in some places where they may not be very warmly welcomed. The plan of a Convention in New York next spring is already under discussion, and one will probably be held there at that time, if the city is not previously destroyed by a worse fiend than the fire at Chicago. The Association also has its eye on several other places,—as Philadelphia, St. Louis, Milwaukee, Cleveland. Let the friends in these cities be getting ready, for they are marked.

TYPES ON THE RAMPAGE.

THE INDEX in general is well printed. It is quite as free, probably, as most newspapers from misprints. Yet its compositors occasionally blunder, as its readers have doubtless discovered and its writers know even still better. The writers generally smother their rasped feelings in silence, knowing very well that half the time their own manuscript is to blame, and the readers guess their way along as best they can, and usually come out all right. But sometimes the errors accumulate and become noticeable for their very ludicrousness. This was the case in the issue of Nov. 4th. "O. B. F.," describing the radical minister in England, is made to say that he mingles "poetry" with the world. Probably he wrote some such simple word as "freely." And "W. J. P." is represented as twice saying, as if to emphasize the remarkable assertion, that the book of Job is a "form." If any reader is still puzzling over this reiterated piece of critical wisdom, it is time that he were relieved by telling him that for "form" he must read "poem." There are other antics, but these are the most conspicuous. As we pondered over the problem of this unusual "rampage" of the types, the reason appeared clear in the editorial leader. The hilarity of the editor, shared doubtless by the proof-reader, over the noble success in raising the $50,000 subscription explained all and was a sufficient excuse. What wonder if, with the glitter of that $50,000 so close at hand, and all for THE INDEX, they should see "poetry" in the "world" and be incapable of distinguishing between "poems" and "forms?"

W. J. P.

[We do not wonder that such "antics," when they escape correction, are very annoying to our contributors, and we are very sorry they cannot always be prevented. Out of the thousands of such blunders made, a few will elude observation. From the first we have been the only proof-reader of THE INDEX, going over the whole paper twice every week. As every proof-reader knows, errors like the above which substitute one word for another are the hardest to detect, it being exceedingly difficult to read proof with reference to the sense and the typography at the same time. Mr. Potter very generously invents an excuse for our carelessness in the above cases, and turns his and Mr. Frothingham's misfortunes into a kindly joke. But the real excuse (so far as it is one) must be a tired eye and still more tired mind, kept often at their work at an hour when we trust our poor victims are saved by peaceful slumbers from all remembrance of their typographical martyrdoms in THE INDEX.—ED.]

Rev. W. T. Clarke has become the editor of the Revolution, and a better one could not have been found. The form of the paper is changed, and a skilful and experienced hand is manifest on every page. Mr. Clarke's rare ability in journalism makes us anticipate great success for the Revolution under his management; and no one will be better pleased than we when it comes. Here is one of his paragraphs which is as sensible as it is sprightly, and which contains hints of a wider application than is perhaps meant:—

"We welcome and invite articles, correspondence and items of interest from friends of woman's enfranchisement and elevation in all parts of the country. Those who wish their communications returned if not used will please enclose the postage. But we beg our friends to remember that this paper is not published for the benefit of contributors but for readers, and that we shall use whatever is sent us as material for making just the best paper we possibly can. The caterer does not prepare his dinner for the benefit of market-men, but for the enjoyment of his guests. Any contributor who does not wish a contribution adapted to our columns will please inform us of the fact. An article of over a column must have a double quantity of shortening in it to ensure acceptance."

"The Horatios of action," says Buckle in his Essays, p. 196, "discourage the Hamlets of thought." Alas for the man of ideas, if he falls into the clutches of your man of facts!

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

UNITARIANISM.

THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL,
MEADVILLE, Pa., Sept. 27, 1871.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—THE INDEX comes regularly to our school, where it is fairly read and considered, if it is not always endorsed.

Many of the ideas it contains are new to the popular mind, and suggestive of thought. It interests and stimulates me when reading it, because it gives consistent expression to the unorthodox views of earnest minds who seek for themselves and others the benefits of higher religious truth.

But in a copy of THE INDEX of Sept. 16, an expression has just caught my eye which seems to be unworthy of a truly liberal spirit. In the paragraph in which you give a tribute to the memory of Dr. Gannett, to whom you "pay the glad homage of an involuntary veneration," you say:—"For Unitarianism we have little respect left." Why is it that you, who are supposed to represent the extreme of liberal thought, should be opposed to others who are also its exponents in other ways and in different degrees? Are not all who are sincere workers for the attainment of wiser and purer life worthy of respect? Is there not an important and noble work for Unitarians to do, as well as for others who are ready and willing?

Please favor us with an explanation of the reasons which gave rise to your statement.

Respectfully yours,
MARMORA DE VOE.

CAN PHILOSOPHY BE ESTABLISHED ON AN OBJECTIVE BASIS?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—I infer that you do not consider Kant's thesis—"The real in its highest sense can not be an object of consciousness"—as proved. Will you allow me to give some reasons for believing that it is true, and that, if "the revolution started by Kant has nearly run its course," no application of the modern scientific method to metaphysics will "establish philosophy on a thoroughly objective basis;" and that the "logical outcome" of the thesis is not "pure and absolute idealism," but mitigated scepticism?

Kant's thesis is called by other philosophers the doctrine of the relativity of all knowledge, and Sir William Hamilton says that this "great axiom, that all human knowledge, and consequently all human philosophy, is only of the relative or phenomenal," is with the exception of a few late absolutist theorists in Germany "perhaps the truth of all others most harmoniously reached by every philosopher of every school." John Stuart Mill says that this doctrine "is one of great weight and significance, which impresses a character on the whole mode of thinking of whoever receives it, and is the key-stone of one of the only two possible systems of metaphysics and psychology." He says also that between the extreme form of one mode of the doctrine of relativity as accepted by Hartley, James Mill, and Bain, and the other extreme form as held by Kant, there are many intermediate systems, and among these are those of Brown and Spencer; but all accept the doctrine in its "widest sense," and affirm "the entire inaccessibility to our faculties of any other knowledge of things than that of the impressions which they produce in our mental consciousness." Huxley says, that Kant declared all knowledge to be the consciousness of mental phenomena, and that the only absolute certainty is the existence of mind; whatever the universe may be, all that we know of it, says Huxley, is the picture presented by consciousness. "Matter and force are mere names for certain forms of consciousness;" which means that the pictures presented by consciousness are not true copies, but symbols of the things, or realities, of the external world. J. Stuart Mill says: "The question of an external world is the great battle-ground of metaphysics, not so much from its importance as because, while it relates to the most familiar of mental acts, it forcibly illustrates the characteristic differences of two metaphysical methods, the introspective and the psychological," that is, the intuitional and the scientific.

Lewes says that the "history of philosophy" shows how vain is the hope of establishing philosophy on a thoroughly objective basis. The questions of the reality, nature, and origin of the external world and our knowledge, are the great problems which agitated the philosophical schools of Greece more than 2000 years ago, and which are still being agitated. After the Eleatics, Xenophanes, &c., had vexed the problems of existence to no purpose, and declared that the testimony of the senses and of experience was no criterion of the truth or reality of things, there came Democritus, Anaxagoras, Plato, and Aristotle, who endeavored to settle the problems of the nature and origin of knowledge; and these "ancient researches ended in the sceptics, the stoics, and the new Academy: that is to say, in scepticism, common sense, and scepticism again." But men were, as they are now, not content "to sit down in quiet ignorance of those things that are beyond the reach of their capacities;" and philosophy, baffled in Greece, fled to Alexandria, where reason was given up for ecstasy, and philosophy was merged in religion, the result being neo-platonism and Christianity. In modern times philosophy has completed a similar circle, and "we are left in this nineteenth century precisely at the same point at which we were in the fifth." After Descartes and Spinoza, came Hobbes and Locke; and the modern researches into the nature and origin of knowledge have "ended in Berkeley, Hume, Reid and Kant; that is, in idealism, scepticism, common sense, and scepticism again;" to which may be added mysticism again, as in Schelling, who identified philosophy with religion. (Mysticism, according to Mill, is the ascribing of objective existence to the subjective creations of the mind's own faculties, and believing that, by watching and contemplating these creations, or mere ideas, of the intellect, what takes place in the world without may be read in them).

Now, if the new revolution is not to end in a new mysticism, if philosophy is to be established on a thoroughly objective basis, we must first determine if we have any innate, or a priori ideas, or, as intuitionists now call them, necessary truths or fundamental ideas.

I agree with the philosophy which affirms that all ideas are dependent on experience; and what is our experience? A certain set of sensations. Science demonstrates that our sensations do not resemble the external object which we infer to be the cause of them. More investigation, or more progress in science, or more evolution of mental power, may be the cause of more sensations, but how can we ever know more than our sensations? We know that the sensations of heat, light, sweetness, odor, &c., are not like the objects that produce them; what can there be in scientific discovery that can overcome this difficulty? If things can be known to us only as they affect our organism, then it follows that Kant's thesis that "the real in its highest sense can not be an object of consciousness" is true; and that the application of the modern scientific method, with the utmost rigor, profundity, and consistency, cannot establish philosophy on a thoroughly objective basis, that is, discover the cause or principles on which all knowledge and all existence rests. Science will still remain a science of appearances, and not of realities.

Descartes and Spinoza say, I suppose, the best that can be said for Intuitionism. Scepticism was widely spread at the time of Descartes. He saw that his sense knowledge was disputable, for he was often misled by appearances; and, having vainly sought for a criterion of certainty in the prevalent system of philosophy to test the reality or conformity of his ideas with external things, that is, to see if his conceptions were true copies of the objects which were inferred to be the causes of the states of consciousness which constitute the phenomena of mind, he determined to believe nothing but on the clearest evidence of reason. Doubting the existence of God, the world, in fact everything, he came to the consciousness of his own existence. This he could not doubt, and even supposing that he was deceived by some superior intellectual power, still it was he that was deceived. This consciousness, which revealed the irreversible fact of his own existence, he made the basis of all knowledge, the only criterion of certitude, and proclaimed that every thing of which he was clearly and distinctly conscious, or which he could clearly and distinctly perceive, must be true, and exist, if the idea of the thing involved existence.

On this basis he proved that a God existed who would not deceive. In his consciousness he found that he was a miserable, a finite and an imperfect being; but as these attributes imply the correlatives infinity and perfection, there must be a reality corresponding to this clear and distinct conception; for, if an infinitely perfect being does not exist, he, Descartes, must have made the conception, and, if he made it, he could unmake it, which was impossible, for he could not get rid of the conception (Descartes appears to have disregarded the fact that ideas early and strongly impressed upon the mind and supported by general opinion are never easily got rid of). Therefore Descartes concluded that there must be, external to himself, an archetype from which his idea was derived; and as this archetype is God, and Perfection, God cannot deceive his creatures, because that would be imperfection. From consciousness Descartes proved a Duality—a God, and a world created by God, containing two essentially distinct substances, Mind and Matter, or Thought and Extension. But Spinoza, who pushed the deductive method of Descartes to its legitimate conclusions, rejected Descartes' idea that the primal fact of all existence was Perfection. Perfection, said Spinoza, is an attribute of something prior to it. Substance is the arche or one principle from which "all philosophy, as all existence, must start." Extension and Thought are attributes of one Infinite Substance; every thing is a mode of God's attribute of Extension; every thought, or feeling, is a mode of God's attribute of Thought. Extension is visible Thought, Thought is invisible extension; they are the Objective and Subjective of which God is the Identity. God is the "idea immanens;" the equivalent of Hegel's Infinite Being which contains within itself "all that is actual, even evil included." And Spinoza expressly teaches that the subjective fact is the actual image or complete expression of the objective fact.

The speculations, which followed Spinoza's pushing the intuitional method to its legitimate conclusion, began by Gassendi and Hobbes, and, further developed by Locke and his followers, merged into the "experience psychology" and brought philosophy into this dilemma. If Spinoza's premise that "every clear and distinct idea is subjectively and objectively true," then his system is true. If the premise is false, then his system is false; consciousness is not the basis of certitude and philosophy when consistently carried out. The dilemma is scepticism or Spinozism, which Boyle, Warburton, Stewart, Hallam and others call atheism, though Lewes may be right who calls it a religious philosophy.

If permissible, I will give in another article a statement of the method of the experience psychology, and my reasons for doubting whether the logical outcome of Kant's thesis is pure and absolute idealism.

QUESTIONS FOR THE ORTHODOX.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y., Oct. 11, 1871.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT:—

As a seeker and inquirer after truth, the following questions have come to me for answer; and since the endeavor to explain and vindicate the claims of orthodoxy gave rise to them, orthodoxy should answer them. Will some "Champion" of the "true faith" (brother Howard, for instance, or any one, so the question be clearly answered) help me from doubt to established fact? It may be the child's question; but the child in spiritual thought needs answer:

1. Does the salvation of men depend in any special sense on the life or death of Jesus Christ?
2. Did the excellence of character and person in Jesus Christ differ in kind, or in degree, or both, from that possessed by men of to-day?
3. Does man really need a Mediator (a middle power or means) that he may come to God?
4. Is it a fact that the development of my spiritual nature, the growth of the soul in righteousness and Godliness both of heart and mind, is the work of Jesus Christ, operating upon me or within me (I being conscious or unconscious of his presence)?
5. If experience and discipline shall have so attuned the man that the soul's music shall be sweeter and its power greater than the desire of sense is strong, will not his effort to realize his ideal virtues in daily life, the strengthening influence of good deeds done and kind words spoken by him, his aspiration to know the "open secret" of the universe, work in him righteousness (right-mindedness) and Godliness (God-likeness)?

With hearty admiration, Mr. Editor, for your success in bringing "glad tidings" to mankind and of your method in touching the key-board of the human soul, I remain

Very respectfully yours,

L. F. GARDNER.

WHERE IS HEAVEN?

BY FREDERIC R. MARVIN.

"Light," says Robert Kane, in his Elements of Chemistry, page 83, "travels 195,000 miles in a second." At that rate it must travel 11,700,000 miles in a minute, or 702,000,000 miles in an hour, or 16,848,000,000 miles in a day, or 117,936,000,000 miles in a week, or 6,149,520,000,000 miles in a year of 365 days, or 614,952,000,000,000 miles in a hundred such years, or 61,495,200,000,000,000 miles in a hundred such centuries.

But light, according to A. J. Davis (Stellar Key, part 1, p. 123), travels 213,000 miles in a second. At that rate light must travel 12,780,000 miles in a minute, or 766,800,000 miles in an hour, or 18,403,200,000 miles in a day, or 128,822,400,000 miles in a week, or 6,717,168,000,000 miles in a year of just 365 days, and in a hundred such years light must travel 661,716,800,000,000 miles, and in a thousand such years light must travel 6,717,168,000,000,000 miles, and in a hundred centuries it must travel 66,171,680,000,000,000 miles.

"From the moon," says the same author, "it takes five quarters of a second for light to come to us," that is, one second and a quarter. According to Mr. Davis the earth must be 266,250 miles from the moon, and as light is admitted by the same author to come from the sun to the earth in eight minutes, the earth must be believed by him to be 102,240,000 miles from the sun. At this rate light will take three years to come to us from the nearest fixed star, and from a star of the seventh magnitude 180 years, and from one of the twelfth magnitude 4,000 years, and yet this incomprehensible distance is comparatively but a Sabbath-day's journey into infinite space. If heaven is beyond the stars of the twelfth magnitude, as the orthodox teach, the soul after death must travel faster than light, or be over 4,000 years reaching heaven. What then becomes of the celebrated declaration of Jesus uttered on the cross—"To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise!" Or will the soul at death be translated from earth to heaven? If so, the power which will accomplish the translation must be as incomprehensible as the distance traveled by the soul, or through which the soul is translated.

That we may receive some conception of the velocity with which light travels, let us remember that its velocity is over twice the velocity of electricity, and yet, according to Professor Ganat, the velocity of electricity is such as to carry a current around the earth in a quarter of a second, that is at the rate of 100,000 miles a minute, or from the earth to the sun, supposing the sun to be 102,240,000 miles from the earth, in seventeen hours and two minutes. Where is heaven? How far is it from our earth?

"Where is the land of light,
The land of which we sing?"

INDEX TRACTS

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION have published the following tracts, and will publish others of a similar character, if encouraged to do so by the receipt of enough orders to cover the expense:-

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no abler, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Fifteen copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. It gives reliable statistics showing that, at the lowest estimate, this system would take about Forty Thousand Years to convert the world; and quotes the highest authorities proving the utter failure of the Catholics to civilize the Paraguay Indians, and of the Protestants to civilize the Sandwich Islanders, in any true sense of the word. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Fifteen copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution?" Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single Copies Ten Cents; Eight Copies Fifty Cents; Twenty Copies One Dollar.

Also, the scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition by PARKER PILLSBURY, entitled "The Sunday Question," is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents. Address—

Second Series, Just Published—

21. Fanaticism : how displayed by well-meaning people in their judgment and action respecting religion in others.
22. Let your Faith honor God, not calumniate Him : reject all testimony that speaks ill of God.
23. Who Wrote It? a proper and useful inquiry when an unreasonable claim is urged on the ground that "it is written."
24. Periodical Prayer : ask when you want to ask; thank when you want to thank; be honest in prayer.
25. Hear the other Side : seek an intelligent faith, instead of blindly following ignorance and prejudice.
26. Man's Duty to God : above all things do not neglect it; but take care, too, not to be misled in regard to it.
27. Penny-wise, Pound-foolish : to claim divine inspiration for unworthy imputation on the divine character.
28. A Touchstone for false Teachers : God certainly gave reason and conscience to be our guides.
29. Justice and Love vs. Mercy : God's actual method better than the supposed "plan of salvation."
30. Prepared to Die : an unveiling of some clerical false pretences.
31. "Even as Others?" showing a point of resemblance between the "evangelicals" and those believers whom they stigmatize as "unbelievers."
32. Do Men need Salvation? a look towards God directly, not through the dark-stained church-windows.
33. Unchangeable : will God ever refuse to welcome the repenting and returning sinner?
34. Lost Sinners : men sometimes lose their children; did G. d ever lose, can he lose, his children?
35. Times and Seasons : two false notions considered; one about Friday, one about Sunday.
36. Do they really believe it? cases where Orthodoxy follows tradition in opposition to Scripture.
37. The Boston Revival and its Leader : methods of operation of Rev. A. B. Earle, professional revivalist.
38. He Rejects the Bible : a false charge refuted, and the opposing truth clearly shown.

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO
FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

"COMPULSORY EDUCATION."

[Substance of an address to the First Independent Society of Toledo, Oct. 1, 1871.]

"But, Jove all-bounteous, who, in clouds
Enwrap, the lightning wildeest!
Mayest thou from baneful IGNORANCE
The race of men deliver!
This, Father, scatter from the soul,
And grant that we the wisdom
May reach, in confidence of which Thou justly guidest all things."

CLEANTHES, Hymn to Jupiter.

"The discipline of our Public Schools, wherein punctuality and regularity are enforced and the pupils are continually taught to suppress mere self-will and inclination, is the best school of morality. Self-control is the basis of all moral virtues, and industrious and studious habits are the highest qualities we can form in our children. A free, self-conscious, self-controlled manhood is to be produced only through universal public education at public cost; and as this is the object of our government, it is proper for our government to provide his means and at the cost of the people."

WILLIAM T. HARRIS, How Far may the State Provide for the Education of her Children at Public Cost? An Essay read before the National Educational Association, St. Louis, Aug. 23, 1871.

One of the three fundamental principles upon which the Toledo Liberal Alliance was organized last summer is—"Free and universal education to be provided and enforced by the State." This is the essential meaning of what is commonly called "compulsory education"—a phrase which, as used by enlightened men, is too often misunderstood, and therefore is in some respects an unfortunate one. It is the purpose of the present essay to consider this whole subject in a broad light, and, so far as is possible, to remove some of the misconceptions which now obscure it. One of the "Fifty Affirmations" states that—"The great practical means of Free Religion is the integral, continuous, and universal education of man;" integral, as embracing the cultivation of all the powers and capacities of human nature in their due proportions, continuous, as never ceasing while life lasts; universal, as being extended to all members of the human race. In no other way, conceive, will it be possible to realize the great end of Free Religion—"the perfection or complete development of man." The subject on which I intend to speak, therefore, is one strictly and peculiarly appropriate to this platform; for I know of no question which better deserves to be called religious, if the true essence of religion is the active effort to develop and perfect humanity in all directions. Only by education can the individual be brought to realize the ideal of personal harmony with the great, universal system of Nature; and only by education can society be brought to realize the ideal of a social system which shall aim first and last at the universal prevalence of such harmony throughout the world. Each for all—all for each; education is the road to this grand consummation of human life.

The most dangerous enemy of republican institutions is ignorance. Even crime is a smaller peril. Educated criminals are comparatively rare, and their power for mischief would be slight but for their influence over the uneducated. The great majority of educated men and women are peaceable, orderly, well-behaved citizens; and the occasional Ruloffs are only the exceptions making good the rule. But ignorance is of itself the precursor to crime, and almost the necessitator of it, in a community where the average intelligence is high. All doors to wealth and distinction being shut to the ignorant man, he is doomed by his very ignorance to poverty, and poverty, with its privations and heart-burnings and despairs, drives him too often into crime. In fact, the higher you raise the average of education in any community, the more dangerous and demoralizing you thereby make the influences of ignorance. Crimes, it is said, are rare among the uncivilized, careless, uniformly ignorant tribes of Africa; they have multiplied with our so-called civilization because our civilization has only reached a part of our people. Wherever you find high civilization and low barbarism co-existent in one place, as in Paris or New York, there you find a very hot-bed of crime. The only safety to any social system lies in making the people homogeneous, undivided into classes of wide extremes, and untracked by social jealousies. There is no future for a stratified civilization. If the great law of solidarity is broken, Nature revenges herself in social outbreaks and upheavals. Hence the terrible peril to our republic, if we suffer the gradual formation of a large minority within it who are sunk in poverty and ignorance. We shall doom our government to sure destruction, unless we can discover and apply some means of making our people homogeneous—to a reasonable extent equalized on a high common level of intelligence and competence. Of course there will be disparities; but there must be no disparities.

What more frightful warning could we have had of our growing danger, than the present condition of New York City? The ignorant classes have so multiplied there as to hold supreme political power. Knaves and rogues have fastened upon their natural prey; and the Tammany Ring is the result. The same fate awaits every other city in America in which the same conditions shall obtain. A mob like that so fortunately put down in New York last July exists in embryo in every town of considerable size throughout the land. This fact, so full of menace to our institutions, is partly due to the great flood of immigration from the Old World, but also in part to our own deficient system of education. What right have we to allow a whole generation of "street Arabs" to grow up in our cities? These boys and girls are Americans born and bred; but instead of growing up to be worthy American citizens, they are ripening for the penitentiary and the gallows. The roughs and rowdies of the metropolis have been the body-guard of Tweed and Sweeny, Connolly and Hall and their accomplices; but it is the vast mass of uneducated voters of the city, innocent of great crimes, that has given them their power. Without the ignorance of the many, the crimes of the few could never have grown to such monstrous and horrible proportions. Let us recognize the fact that it is general ignorance, far more than occasional criminality, that is sapping the foundations of our American commonwealth. Remove the ignorance, and the crimes will be very easy to suppress.

Now our system of free schools is the only weapon we have with which to conquer this gigantic demon of ignorance. It is worth infinitely more than whole armies of policemen and militia men; for, instead of shooting down rioters and hunting down public peculators, it prevents the development of their crimes by educating the masses into citizens too orderly and intelligent to be made tools. Free and universal education will flank the moral evils that are now invading the republic as the hordes of Huns and Goths and Vandals invaded the Roman Empire. Yet, sad and alarming as is the confession, there is a great and rapidly increasing opposition to our free school system which must be put down, or our future will be black as ink. A recent writer in Harper's Weekly has made the following statements:—

No more alarming fact appears in the condition of our city—not even the gross corruption of its rulers and the total decay of public morality—than that its free school system has received a fatal blow. Its children are ceasing to attend school. Each year the usual increase in attendance has been three or four thousand; but since 1869 it has scarcely been as many hundred. Population advances, but the number of pupils in the public schools remains nearly unchanged. Should this condition of things continue, it is easy to see that in a few years the system of general education must sink into decay, and wholly fail to supply that basis of intelligence and virtue upon which all free government must rest. To destroy our free schools, and perhaps our free institutions, has been for many years the constant aim of the extreme section of the Romish Church. The Romish Church has become identified with the society of Loyola; the Jesuits rule at Rome; the daring and aggressive spirit of that singular body has found a suitable instrument in the Irish Catholics; the Irish Catholics govern New York. Such is the unhappy condition of our free city that the priestly influence which has been cast off with abhorrence in all foreign lands—except, perhaps, in distracted France—has thrown its blight upon the very sources of our advancing intelligence and prosperity. In Italy a vigorous free-school system has been introduced in defiance of the intrigues of the priests or the anathemas of the Pope. In Rome itself, beneath the shadow of the Vatican, education is open to all. Spain is slowly imitating Italy. And it is scarcely three years since fifteen hundred school-masters, the most valuable and progressive portion of the Austrian population, met in an assembly in Vienna, and demanded from the government the perfect freedom of the public schools. Their request was granted; education was relieved from the intolerable burden of priestly interference; the Pope in vain hurled anathema or allocation against the rising intelligence of the people.

"But while Vienna, Madrid, and Rome have, with signal courage, defied the spiritual and temporal power of their former tyrants, the Irish Catholics, the last adherents of the infallible Pope, have made haste to lay New York at his feet. Of all the great capitals ours is the only one that is priest-ridden. The Jesuits and the Irish appoint our Mayor and Controller, our judges and Police Commissioners, the Board of Aldermen, the Board of Education; and the results of this Catholic rule have become apparent in such enormous peculation, such a wide system of daring robbery, such a rapid growth of crime, such rulers and such officials, as have scarcely been known in the worst governed capitals of Europe. The poor are ground down by an intolerable taxation; corrupt officials in uncounted numbers plunder the people at will; the Romish Church grasps its full share of the spoil. In Madrid, Rome, and Florence, so recently the centres of priestly intolerance, the indignant people have confiscated the ill-gotten gains of the Church, sold monasteries, convents, Jesuit colleges, and abbey lands, and applied their proceeds to the relief of the embarrassed nation. In New York, within a few years, Romish colleges and convents, churches, hospitals, and cathedrals, have sprung up in startling numbers, and were paid for, either secretly or openly, from the already bankrupt treasury of the city. Already we need a Henry VIII. to break up our monasteries, and many will imitate the example of Italy or Spain."

The power thus nefariously acquired by the Catholics has been steadily and remorselessly directed against our free school system, and with alarming success, as shown by the relative decrease of attendance in New York. The Catholic papers I read are full of denunciations of our free schools. They clamor for a division of the school funds, which would be the destruction of the entire school system. They dread the enlargement of knowledge, because it breaks the fetters of ecclesiastical rule. They oppose all schools in which the Catholic religion is not drilled into the children's minds. They anathematize all free thought, as sure to lead to perdition. They oppose all real education and independence of intellect, because these cannot be made subservient to Catholic supremacy. They seek to foster and spread public ignorance, that the Church may gain in America the power it had in the Dark Ages, but is losing in Europe day by day.

Now this assault by the Catholics on our free schools, which are almost secular in character, is blindly seconded by most of our Protestant sects. They insist on retaining the Bible in the schools, and have nearly as great a horror of strictly secular education as the Catholics. Even the Christian Union, the organ of Henry Ward Beecher, who so surely as a liberal an Evangelical preacher as can well be found, thus denounces the exclusion of religious exercises from our colleges:—"If, to avoid offending the Christian denominations, it be necessary thus to minify or dismiss spiritual culture from our higher schools, it were better that each church endow its own school, build high walls, raise its flag bravely, cease to apologize for, and begin to inculcate religion. Colleges that are stridulously sectarian were a less evil than colleges without piety and without God." When the most liberal of Protestants is thus found echoing the Catholic cry against secular education, what clear mind can resist the conclusion that such education is opposed by the very genius of Christianity itself, and that the secular system of instruction, the only possible system that can be really free, must depend for its defence at last upon those who have practically ceased to be governed by Christianity? I cannot help seeing that the issue is slowly making up between Christianity and ignorance, on the one hand, and Free Religion and knowledge, on the other. Men may think me wild and fanatical and absurd in coming to this conclusion, but not many years hence I believe that thousands upon thousands will agree with me in it. The great battle between free, universal education and the Catholic Church is growing every day more and more imminent; and it will cleave the Protestants into two distinct parties. One portion must side with the Catholics against our free schools, the other with us in defence of them.

Ignorance, then, is the great foe of republican institutions; and Christianity, whether Catholic or Protestant, is on its side. All that are free and freedom-loving in this nation, all that are in favor of republican principles and republican government, will be called to battle with this terrible enemy as never before. Nay, the hour has already come; and if we would not be surrounded and captured, we must grapple the foe to-day. What shall be our tactics—what the plan of our campaign in defence of a commonwealth based on freedom and knowledge and virtue?

The remedy for misgovernment by ignorance proposed by many radicals is the limitation of suffrage by an educational qualification. "Let no one vote who cannot read and write, and let us thus preserve the nation from the vast wave of ignorance that is about to break over it." I am sorry to see that even so able and clear a thinker as Mr. Conway joins in this demand:—"Democracy in America has shown itself to have been the effort of society to pass from an arbitrary to a natural classification. No sooner has the last vestige of the unreal aristocracy disappeared with the slaveholding class, than Radicalism starts forward with the demand for an educational qualification in the suffrage. To demand that every voter shall be able to read is little; but when readers alone are electors, the standard must ascend." [The Earthward Pilgrimage, p. 393.] If I rightly understand this passage, Mr. Conway favors the reading-and-writing condition of suffrage—not as sufficient, it is true, but as at least advisable so far as it goes.

On the contrary, I consider this supposed demand of "Radicalism" as a very great and dangerous error. I have several reasons.

1. The educational test cures nothing. It does not abolish the great evil of ignorance, or even tend to abolish it. It rather tends to perpetuate it, for no disfranchised class is properly cared for or educated by a dominant class. So long as the ignorance of the masses visibly endangers life and property and the stability of society, as is the case so long as ignorance votes, vast efforts will be made to educate ignorance. But deprive it of all political power, and it will be left to its own devices, to grow more and more ignorant and wretched still. The educational test would have the effect of leaving the cancer to grow unchecked in the body politic until death or violent revolution should become inevitable. The danger of having a disfranchised class in the community is enormous; and it is a great mistake to suppose that the desire of voting would be a sufficient motive to induce the ignorant voters in our cities to learn to read and write. Once having been enfranchised, they would now be embittered and exasperated by subsequent disfranchisement; and a large body of politically discontented people in any community is most perilous to its peace. The limitation of suffrage would not cure the evil of ignorance. At most this would only confine it for a season, oblivious of the certainty of its ultimately wreaking a dreadful revenge for its temporary repression. What is wanted is a radical cure, not a momentary and shallow expedient.

2. The knowledge of mere reading and writing, even if made a condition of suffrage, would not secure us from ignorant suffrage. Millions of ignorant people can read and write, while not a few intelligent people cannot. No conceivable test of intelligence would exclude ignorant voters from the polls, unless you should make it so stringent a one as to exclude a very large per cent. of the population—an evil even greater than that which now exists. The impracticability of applying the reading-and-writing test in any fair or efficient manner does but enhance the difficulty.

3. The "Radicalism" which fails to perceive that this country is irrevocably pledged and committed to strictly universal suffrage (including woman suffrage in the near future) is not worthy of the name. This country is destined to be ruled by the whole people, and may as well recognize the fact early as late. Revolutions do not often go back; and to expect a voluntary surrender of political power by any portion of the population is preposterous. Who will be the Sir Archibald Bell-the-Cat to attempt to disfranchise the Irish voters of New York city? All speculations and propositions to limit suffrage in any way beyond its existing limitations are utterly visionary. The tendency is all the other way, and ought to be. Women must vote before very long; and the talk about an educational qualification for the ballot either for men or women is wasted breath. Not thus can the perils to our political future from wide-spread ignorance be averted.

4. All people, in fine, who conduct themselves as well-behaved citizens, whether ignorant or not, have a right to a voice in the country's government. The virtuous have no inherent right to govern the vicious, nor the educated the ignorant; so long as the vicious or the ignorant keep out of jail, they have a right to a share in the government, and we must make the best of it. The injustice of usurpation is a very poor remedy for the evil of ignorance. Those who can read and write are not a divinely constituted aristocracy to govern the rest of mankind. Criminals who break the laws may be disfranchised as a penalty; but the worst criminals frequently escape all punishment, because they cannot be caught or proved guilty. Yet a test of character would be far less unjust than a test of intelligence, as a condition of suffrage. Neither, however, would be just; and we must make up our minds to universal suffrage as the people's right, and therefore as a fixed fact for all time. The strongest argument against the educational condition is its intrinsic injustice; and the next strongest is the absolute impossibility of establishing it.

No—the remedy for the public evils of popular ignorance lies in an entirely different direction. Political power must, by natural justice and the logic of American ideas, be diffused throughout the whole people; but the safeguard against the great perils of its abuse must be sought in universal education. The whole people must be raised to such a level of intelligence that they shall use their power wisely. Suffrage must be universal; but EDUCATION MUST AT ALL COSTS BE MADE AS UNIVERSAL AS SUFFRAGE. Whatever stands in the way of universal education, whether private caprice and selfishness and stupidity or organized hostility from foreign excesses on our civilization, must be trampled under foot. If the Catholic Church, or the Protestant Church, or both combined, get in the way of the free, universal education of the American people, so much the worse for them. Such opposition is the worst possible treason against the Great Republic; and whether it attempts to justify itself by the authority of Church or Bible,—whether it makes its assault in the name of God or man,—it must be put down as sternly as the Slaveholders' Rebellion was put down. And it will be. Once convince the people that they must fairly choose between Christianity and Freedom, between the Church and Education, and the issue is fore-ordained by the nature of things. The contest may be long and sharp; but the result is sure. This continent is sacred to Liberty, to Knowledge, to Virtue; and they will triumph over all their foes.

It may seem that I have had very little to say about "compulsory education" thus far. But I could not really treat the subject till I had dwelt on the great evil of ignorance that threatens us, and the absolute necessity of applying at all hazards an adequate remedy to it. It is popular ignorance that necessitates universal education; and the promised panacea for the mischiefs of ignorant government which is now in high favor with some liberals, namely, limitation of suffrage by an educational qualification, needed first of all to be exposed. It is a quack medicine which has been hastily and unwisely recommended by some of our noblest and best thinkers. What is wanted is not medicine, but hygiene—the knowledge and practice of the laws of national health. The evils of wide-spread ignorance cannot be got rid of by excommunicating the ignorant, but by educating them. Let us have no new aristocracy of brain—no new "divine right" of the cultivated to rule the uncultivated. Instead of this, let us have such a system of education as shall ensure to all but born idiots a degree of cultivation sufficient to make it safe to trust them with the ballot. The experiment of strictly universal suffrage has got to be tried fully on this continent; it is idle vamping to talk of limiting suffrage now. Let us face the difficulty like men, and, banishing forever all dreams of an educational qualification, abolish all necessity for such a qualification by ensuring the universality of education.

It is no novelty to advocate "compulsory education." Russia has long practised it—with what results can be learned from Sadova and Sedan. New Hampshire has passed a "compulsory education" law which requires that every parent or guardian shall send his child to school twelve weeks in the year, six of which must be continuous, under penalty of a fine of $10 or $20. Michigan also has passed a somewhat similar law. The Republicans in California have made the following a "plank" of their platform:—"The safety and perpetuity of Republican institutions depend mainly upon popular education and intelligence. We therefore approve and recommend a common school system that shall not only extend its benefits to all, but which shall be compulsory upon all, and we are inflexibly opposed to any application of the public moneys with any reference to the distinctions in religious creeds." How many other States may have adopted the same policy, I do not know. In at least one very important respect, I regard the New Hampshire law as crude and unwise; and I shall presently propose an improvement. But that a strong sentiment is growing up in this country, as well as in Europe, since the marvellous triumphs of Germany, in favor of "compulsory education," is very plain. It is the most hopeful sign in American politics, for it shows that the quick intelligence of the American people leaps to the only sound solution of the problem of ignorant misrule.

The objection to "compulsory education" in the minds of many liberals grows out of a theory of government which limits all governmental powers to the direct protection of life and property. Herbert Spencer holds this theory. But the same foresight which prompts a government to prevent the outbreak of a threatened riot, instead of waiting to quell it afterwards, should prompt it to forestall ignorance, the cause of all riots. Prevention is the best sort of protection. Here in the United States, according to the last census, are five millions of children, of school age, who never attend school! Is there no danger revealed in this fact? What are we about, to leave such a monstrous peril unprovided against? If the nation has itself a right to "life," it must have the right to save its life by timely precautions against this multiplying and magnifying ignorance. Prof. Huxley, in a recent address at Birmingham, set aside the narrow theory of Herbert Spencer by repudiating "the idea of the functions of a government being confined to those of a protective constabulary." "Even accepting the proposition that the functions of the State might be all summed up in one great negative commandment—'Thou shalt not allow any man to interfere with the liberty of any other man,' Prof. Huxley said he was unable to see that the consequence was any such restriction as its supporters implied. If his next door neighbor chose to have his drains in such a state as to create a poisonous atmosphere which he breathed at the risk of typhus and diphtheria, it was just as much a restriction on his just freedom to live as if his life was threatened with a pistol. If his neighbor were allowed to let his children go unvaccinated, he might just as well be allowed to leave strychnine lozenges about in the way of his (Prof. Huxley's) children. And if his neighbor brought up his children untaught and untrained to earn their living, he was doing his best to restrict his (the lecturer's) freedom by increasing the burden of taxation for the support of jails and work-houses for which he had to pay."

In short, it only needs to be made apparent that no State can permanently live which permits any large proportion of its people to grow up in ignorance, in order to convince us that the right to educate its citizens is part of the State's right to protect itself from subversion. There can be no free State without universal suffrage; and there can be no universal suffrage without universal education. That is the whole argument I would urge, put into a nutshell.

But the phrase "compulsory" education is very unfortunate. It misleads. It puts the whole subject in a wrong light. The correction of the error out of which this phrase sprang will do much to remove the popular repugnance to the securing of really universal education.

It was the conception of the ancient Roman law, from which modern law has been in a large measure derived, that a father's right over his child (patria potestas) was absolute, even including power of life and death. This idea is at the bottom of the objection to "compulsory education," though of course greatly modified. The proposition that the child has a right to be educated which no parent has a right to infringe or violate, has probably never occurred to many people. Yet this is one of the propositions by which I ascribe to the State the duty of enforcing universal education. Children have rights as truly as their parents—none the less so because they neither know them nor know how to maintain them. There is need of a "children's rights movement," quite as much as of a "women's rights movement," and it is the movement in behalf of universal education. The old tyranny of parents over their children, which has nothing to do with the enforcement of a just authority used for the children's good, but only consists in perverting this authority to the children's harm, should be abolished.

The reason why the phrase "compulsory education" offends the American ear is because it suggests the idea of compelling parents to relinquish a power they are justly entitled to. The moment it is seen that parents have no right to withhold education from their children—no more right to starve their minds than their bodies,—it becomes plain that the enforcement by the State of universal education is not compulsion of the parent, but protection of the child. If any parent violates the child's right to be educated—his right to a fair chance in life—his right to enter on a career which shall not have the jail as its fore-ordained terminus,—then the State has as much right to compel respect for this as for any other violated right. Such a parent is a CRIMINAL. Mr. A. J. Mundella, M. P., of Sheffield, England, says that experience has taught him that "where the education of children is wholly dependent upon the parents, the selfishness, indifference, or intemperate habits of many will cause a considerable number to be entirely neglected or only partially educated." This sentence strikes the nail on the head. Thousands of parents keep their children from school for the sake of utilizing their labor, even of making money out of them at the expense of all their subsequent happiness in life. But a parent has no right to make a drudge out of his child for his own private advantage. It is his business to support the child till the child has at least received the elements of an education. Nature does not devolve on young children the support of their parents. I repeat it, the parent who so abuses his authority over his child is neither more nor less than a criminal; and he ought to be "compelled" to cease his crime. Let the whole subject be looked at from the side of the child as well as from the side of the parent, and nothing could be clearer than that the State is bound to ensure education to each and every child born into its jurisdiction. Life, liberty, and education—these are the primal rights of man. Let us amend the Declaration of Independence accordingly.

No less has the State a right to secure educated citizens, since ignorance on part of the citizens is death to the State. If the State has a right to exist, it has a right to make sure the conditions of existence. I will not dwell further on this point, having already said enough; but no right views on this subject can be taken which do not contemplate it from the side of the children, on the one hand, and of the State, on the other. The right of every child to be educated, and the right of the State to secure the education of all its citizens,—these are the two pillars on which rests the whole theory of universal or "compulsory" education. In one sense, all education is "compulsory," since no child will work or study if he can play instead; and whoever sends his child to school at all enforces "compulsory education" in this sense. In fact, this is the only proper sense of the word "compulsory" in this connection; for I scout the idea that it is "compulsion" to guarantee to children their native right to be educated. I would "compel" the parents to respect this right only as I would compel a thief to restore the property he has stolen.

One point, however, of great importance remains to be touched upon; and I have never yet seen it mentioned. It is this. While the theory I advocate would oblige the State to furnish, free of all cost to the parent, opportunities for the best possible education for the child, and thus make it impossible for any one to plead poverty as an excuse for keeping his child from school, I should not approve a requisition that all the children should be obliged to attend the public schools. Make, if you can, the public schools so good that the parents shall use them by preference. But it is the parent's prerogative to choose the mode and means of educating his child. If he prefers to educate him in a private school, or at home, the State has no right to compel him to adopt a different method. All the State has a right to require is the fact of education. Provided the parent does not deprive the child of education itself, he has a right to follow his own judgment in determining the manner of it. I think that a clear understanding on this point would obviate many objections to enforced universal education.

As a consequence of this view of the matter, I would suggest the propriety of establishing STATED PUBLIC EXAMINATIONS for all children, under the auspices of the best citizens of each locality, instead of requiring their attendance at the public schools. If a child can pass a good examination in the various branches announced beforehand by public authority, that fact should be enough; he should not be obliged to bring any certificate of attendance at any particular school. If he fails to pass a good examination, let the reason be inquired into, and if no good one can be given, then let the child be required to attend the public schools, and the delinquent parent be fined. Some such system as this, I am satisfied, will be eventually adopted, as the best way to secure at the same time the best possible education of the children and the largest possible liberty of the parents. The strict Prussian system can never be imitated in America; larger concessions must be made to individuality of choice. But the result desired—the assurance of universal intelligence—must and will be attained in the United States. As thus explained, I believe that the entire future of this country hinges on the adoption of the system of universal or "compulsory" education; and every lover of freedom, knowledge, and virtue will do his part towards hastening the day of its complete establishment.

MOTHERHOOD BY DEPUTY.

[By Col. Higginson, in the Woman's Journal.]

Those who spend their summers at Newport have an opportunity to see how children live in what may be called, for the sake of argument, the genteeler classes. (I am led to use this expression by the fact that a New York lady once said to me of another lady, "She makes no pretensions to gentility," implying that she did make such claims.) Certainly nothing can be prettier than the external aspect of such children. Without the prevailing bloom and robustness of English boys and girls, they have yet enough of these qualities to satisfy physiological criticism, and their American blood gives a grace and ease of motion which is more than an equivalent to the eye. Not over-dressed, except on Sundays and special festivals—garded, but not much checked, by their Irish or colored nurses, they form groups that delight one's eyes on our public parks or on the lawns of Bellevue avenue. Do the little things gain or lose by being genteel or ungenteel?

In some respects they gain greatly. The introduction of English and French ways among our fashionable classes has brought in some ways great benefit to young children. They keep better hours, eat better food, are more scrupulously bathed and more constantly guarded than children of more homely nurture. These last, being more constantly in the society of their parents, share their parents' physiological sins. Because the father has coffee for breakfast, so must the son of five; if the mother partakes of pickles at dinner, her little girl of three must have a taste; and if the elders wish to go to the theatre in the evening, the youngest child must go too. If both parents are employed during the day, the children must be left guarded by other children only—and even in the middle ranks, where there is a domestic or two in the family, there is often nobody to see that little Susy does not stray among the horses in the street, or little Johnny among the green apples. But from these dire perils the youthful Ethel and little Reginald are more systematically guarded; and the very fact that their parents lead more artificial lives introduces the necessity of separating, and therefore simplifying the habits of the children. And this, so far as it goes, is a real gain.

Ah, but the drawback of this separation is, that it so often extends to the hearts and souls of these children, as well as their bodies. This transfer of parental offices to menials may secure more care of their material health, but in all other respects it is disastrous. It is not good for American children that the Irish race should become for them a sort of vast Eccalobion, or egg-hatching machine, doing for money what the parental birds might better do gratis. I sigh to think that to many of these fine children on Bellevue avenue a mother may be no more real a thing than to Mrs. Rawdon Crawley's poor little boy in Thackeray's unequalled description. She, too, visits her child in its nursery sometimes, "like a vivified figure out of the Magasin des Modes, blandly smiling in the most beautiful new clothes." She "nods to him patronizingly," "to drive with that lady in the carriage is a awful site."

Not that she is necessarily heartless and wicked, like Becky Sharp; but at the best, her hours are not the children's hours, and it is not the habit of the world in which she lives to tend one's babies oneself. That is exactly what I deplore. Very strong and warm natures will of course overcome the bad habit. I remember no more charming pictures of parental love than I have seen on the piazzas of young couples whose marriage had seemed to me a thing less serious than the pairing of butterflies until I watched their simple ecstasy over the first child. I do not forget one sweet young mother who stipulated for a cottage on Bellevue avenue where there should be shrubbery in front, beneath whose protecting cover she could play with her baby undisturbed by the gay world as it rolled by. But the fact of her needing that protection is the very thing of which I complain. The exception proves the rule. A French manual of manners points out that "la femme comme il faut" will by no means be seen in the street with her young children. I try in vain to recall an instance where I have ever seen a young mother belonging to what is called "the best society" carrying her baby in her arms or drawing it in a wagon—even in the most retired streets of Newport. Yes, I recall one instance; it was one whom I happened to know, and she apologized!

The result is not, as I have said, that the children's bodies suffer; commonly they do not. The evil of this motherhood by deputy is that it takes the life out of the real relation altogether, and, as Mrs. Stowe well says, "The real mother has none of those awakening influences from the resting of the little head in her bosom and the pressure of the little helpless fingers, which magnetize into existence the blessed power of love." Better a thousand time than such maternity is that of the Irish hovel I visited yesterday, where the poor toilsome mother yet welcomed to her bountiful bosom an added child, and the other boys and girls crowded around the little chubby creature, with reverence and delight, as if it were a new family altar, sent to them that they might say their prayers. The whole furniture of the house would not have sold at auction for ten dollars; but that baby brings a treasure of love and self-sacrifice which many of our summer guests might well give their millions to buy.

THE BIBLE A SCAPEGOAT.—During an interview with "The Prophet" the following point-blank inquiry was made:

"It is charged by many that the Mormon Church is a seditious, a revolutionary body, that its plans embrace in their scope not only the proselytism of all peoples, and their conversion to a full acceptance of its creed, but that it aspires to temporal conquest and the overthrow of the United States Government. Does the Mormon Church entertain such a purpose? A long pause ensued; Brigham was evidently disposed to deliberate before replying. At length he said: 'I suppose if I should tell you 'yes it is true,' you would believe it; if 'no,' you would believe it or not as you felt inclined; then more warmly—but I will say this, the man who believes that we a handful of people here in Utah, contemplate any such thing, is either a cursed fool, or so blinded by his prejudices as to be not worth listening to.'"

Yet Brigham claims that his church is the Church of Christ, and that "unto him every knee shall bow." And in view of forty years of Mormon preaching with this unvarying tenor, the "cursed fool" spoken of above may well be excused for "wanting to know," "you know," if the Mormon Church does not aspire to the temporal and spiritual control of this planet, or, if not the whole at once, as much and as fast as possible. It is all cursed foolery, we admit, but if wisdom is justified of her children, folly is no less backed up by its grandmother, and the Mormons, when accused of wrong doing or intent, fall back upon the Holy Scriptures.—Salt Lake Tribune.

INJUSTICE IN THE PRESS.—Here is one of the leading New York Dailies. During the last four or five years that journal has made, four or five times, the same gross mistatement regarding me, in articles reported to be written by its Editor-in-Chief,—written for a malignant and party purpose; the incorrectness of which its own columns testify. If I were to complain, my letter would not probably be printed. But such sentence of it as could be most plausibly misrepresented, would be copied and made the text for more vituperation—while the chance mistake of some other journal in any trifle is flooded with every scornful epithet in the dictionary.

This is a great injustice. No man, editor or otherwise, has any right to criticise a document of which he does not reproduce in his own columns amply enough to enable his readers to judge whether his criticism is fair.

This silly setting up a straw foe and then ostentatiously knocking him down—this selection of a phrase or two and captiously ringing changes, is the cheap wit and the crying sin of our whole press. It robs it of any value to the honest student of questions and history.—Wendell Phillips in N. Y. National Standard.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"Allow me to extend a New Year's greeting to THE INDEX in the form of a subscription, and the right-hand of fellowship to the man who has dared break loose from the Christian name, and assert his right and capacity to find his way to his Father's house without the leading strings of theological nursemaids.—I have been only an occasional reader of THE INDEX, but I have seen enough of it to make me bid it a hearty God-speed.—The Evangelical Alliance is entering on its week of prayer. With what shocking audacity we stalk, shod with our nineteenth century boots, into the Eternal presence-chamber, and announcing to the Heavenly hosts our views on political economy, social science, and the salvation of souls, humbly petition the Almighty to take notice and govern his universe in accordance! I marvel that we, frail, short-sighted mortals, dare urge aught beside—"Thy will be done." Does Free Religion pray? And if so, what does it pray for? Certainly it does not ask for temporal gifts; for it knows it has but to grasp the antecedents to prosperity, and material success will as surely follow as right conclusions from right premises. The Free-Religionist cannot ask forgiveness for sin, for he knows that he must suffer the penalty of violated law, even to the bitter end. Neither can we join with Orthodoxy in asking help in the hour of temptation, for surely one will be stronger, better, nobler, when he wages warfare with sin, saying—"this thing is beneath me—I will not soil my soul's white plumage in the mire of evil!"—than when he sinks supinely on his knees, crying—"I am weak and sinful; Lord, help me to resist!" Perhaps the metaphysics of either process is the same, but one hinges its faith on the Divine in us, the other, in the Divine outside us. I comprehend the need of communion with God, but that differs, etymologically and practically, from prayer. I enclose $2.00 for THE INDEX the coming year. I hope to send you some other subscriptions before long. There is not a Liberal Church of any description in this county, so of course subscribers to your paper cannot be numerous."

—"Enclosed please find $2.50 for amount of subscription for bound volume of INDEX 1870. Should have sent long ere this, but neglected, and you can set my name down for a bound volume for 1871. I distribute as far as I can what I receive by mail, and want bound volume for reference. I cannot give you much encouragement from this quarter; I could get you but one new subscriber for this year; but I ask all that I know, that are sound thinkers, but they set me down as an "infidel" (and that does no harm). Some say my advanced ideas will never amount to anything for want of proof. They compare opinions of men—that is, great Theologians, Bible Scholars, etc. I am convinced that your course is right, and hope you may be sustained; and what little assistance I can afford is given freely. At the same time I feel as though I had more than the value of the money sent you. The Independent is about to "give way"—I hope you may receive an increase of patronage. Mr. Abbot, would you be kind enough to send one copy to ——. He is a man of good mind, and once a Methodist minister, but now is dealing out Homœopathic doses for the body and leaves the 'soul' to the care of others. I want to approach him cautiously, and would like to see the effect of one dose of INDEX."

—"I like THE INDEX; it is Free, Firm and Fair."

Poetry.

[For THE INDEX.]

“OLD THINGS ARE PASSED AWAY: BE-HOLD, ALL THINGS ARE NEW.”

The old is ever passing
Into newer forms of life;
E'en the solid granite mountain
Yields to elemental strife.

The silent forces working
Convert the stone to sand—
Forever changing places
With the rolling sea the land.

'The grandly waving forests
Slowly form the beds of coal,
And over sinking mountains
The rising oceans roll.

Eternal and unceasing
Are the changes 'neath the sun;
Old forms of life and motion
Into higher channels run.

As stratum after stratum
Rock-ribbed our new-born earth,
Ere animals could flourish,
Or man find humble birth;

So the wrecks of old religions
Pave for Truth a higher way,
And the conflict of the ages
Wears the creeds of men away.

Through the mists of superstition
Threads of truth eternal run,
Linking both the past and present
With the future into one.

Old beliefs and heathen dogmas
Are passing to decay;
On the rising wave of Science
Rides a brighter, fairer day.

Through infancy and childhood
Must come the perfect man;
Advancing from the lower,
Is God's eternal plan.

Ever moving upward, onward,
Nature knows no day of rest:
Always aiming at perfection,
Each new day she counts the best.

To her, the passing ages
Are but a summer's day;
She on their crumbling ruins rears
A nobler work alway.

Thus "the mill of God grinds slowly,
But it grinds exceeding small;"
And, according to his purpose,
He grinds the grists for all.

In his laws of love and wisdom
We trust as those who can,
Who see in his dear Fatherhood
The Brotherhood of Man.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL $100,000.

SHARES EACH $100.

The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 26, 1872. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

PROFITLESS PRAYERS.

The New York Observer (Presbyterian) publishes each week a column devoted to a report of the Fulton St. Prayer Meeting. Written requests are read at each meeting, purporting to come from all parts of the country, and specifying objects for which the prayers of the meeting are solicited. Some of these are very curious. People in all sorts of trouble beg for the intercessions of this meeting, which are believed to have marvellous power in bending the will of God to human wishes,—such power as the intercessions of Catholic priests are believed to have by their simple-minded flocks. It is hard to tell which most deserve pity—the sorrows or the superstitions of the poor petitioners. Sometimes they get what they want, and are jubilant over the "efficacy of prayer;" sometimes they fail to get it, and seem overwhelmed with despair. Here is a touching appeal from one of these victims of evangelical delusion, read in a recent meeting:—

"One from Omaha, Neb. Reads the Observer—encouraged to apply for prayer. Professor of religion; active, but in the dark. For a year prayed very much for a friend, all for naught. Followed what seemed divine direction, but walked right into trouble; have lost all hope. Religion does not fulfil its promises. Pray earnestly for me."

The ills of life are sometimes inevitable; but if the people were better instructed in the great law of cause and effect, and in the utter hopelessness of evading it by prayer or any other means, they would become wise enough to shun many of the miseries that now extort these cries of anguish. Such religion as that of this prayer-meeting fosters delusions out of which spring manifold sufferings and disasters. It does indeed fail to "fulfil its promises."

Nature is at times seemingly hard and stern,—never more so than when we are called to pay the penalty she exacts for the breaking of her laws. But the wisest and the tenderest religion is that which teaches us to obey these laws, rather than to seek exemption from their sway. Christianity encourages flattering but false hopes of this exemption, and is thus most terribly cruel in the end. Reason seems cold and unsympathetic at the start, but proves herself in the final issue of things man's kindest and truest friend. She teaches us how to avoid most human woes, and how to bear nobly the rest.

But it does not follow that God is heartless because he is immutable. It does not follow that he is non-existent because men pray foolishly or ignorantly in vain. From the fact of changeless law we draw no such inferences, even in the presence of human sufferings that most deeply touch our sympathies. It is in no spirit of derision that we read such experiences as are told in the extract given above—far from it. But while they excite compassion for the bewildered and wounded ones that have lost their way in the desert, they do but broaden the foundations of our conviction that the world has in this age an unfathomable need of loftier ideas of life, of Nature, of God.

Would it be any improvement of the universe, any amelioration of human miseries, that natural laws should be bent and broken at the dictate of man? Could anything be plainer than that the power of interfering with their action by means of prayer would involve the world in inconceivable disaster?

Would not the contrariety of men's prayers throw into chaos and confusion all the processes of Nature and destroy all possibility of human happiness? It surely seems so.

Supposing, then, that an infinitely wise and loving God exists, he could not heed such prayers. He could not in consequence of them shift and change and alter the course of things, or thwart the uniformity of natural laws, without thereby proving himself to be neither wise nor loving. The very fact of a great immutable system of Nature, governed by laws that are inflexible to human entreaties, is the only possible fact that could co-exist with infinite wisdom and love. The so-called "efficacy of prayer" would thus be the disproof of a God worthy of intelligent adoration, and only betray the existence of fickleness, feebleness, and folly in the Power that is supreme. It is, on the contrary, the very powerlessness of prayer to swerve by so much as a hair's breadth the course of Nature, that becomes the basis of confidence in omnipresent Reason and Goodness as the law of the entire universe.

Is it not strange, then, that the fact of the invariability of natural laws, which is the granite base of an instructed belief in God, should seem to any man to prove that no God exists? The atheism that denies God because Nature's laws change not for human prayers, borrows its logic from the Christianity it rejects. True, the Christian's God is one that "answers prayer;" and the atheist's appeal to fact is conclusive against such a God. But this appeal has no force against the God whose only answer to prayer is the continued harmony of the universe; and he who finds in this harmony a disproof of God shows that he has no higher an idea of God than that which Christianity has preached from the beginning. It would be well to understand the better idea. With all kindness and goodwill for atheists, some of whom we are proud to call our friends, and all of whom we wish to meet on the broad ground of equal human brotherhood, we urge them to weigh candidly the thoughts here presented. We all appeal to Reason. By the verdict of Reason let us all abide.

PROGRESS.

Through the energy and zeal of one of our Directors, Mr. A. K. Butts, an excellent New York Office has been secured for THE INDEX, and will be put into operation as soon as possible. Messrs. Henry H. Richardson & Co., Importers, Booksellers, and Binders, 22 Vesey St., New York, have with great liberality offered us the use of their office as headquarters. A better or more central location could not be desired; and as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made, THE INDEX will be published in New York and Toledo. The great advantages of this plan are too obvious to need specification.

Mr. R. P. Hallowell, Treasurer of the Free Religious Association, has very generously offered to act as a special agent for THE INDEX in Boston until we can establish a Boston Office. We very gratefully accept his offer, and refer to him all those who may wish to subscribe for THE INDEX in that city. His counting-room is at 98 Federal Street; and he is hereby authorized to receive subscriptions for this paper and to give receipts for the same.

At the same time, Mr. A. K. Butts, Mr.

Parker Pillsbury, Mr. H. L. Green, and Dr. L. Berry are actively canvassing for the paper in various places, and doing all that earnest friendship for it can suggest in other ways.

THE INDEX will have to grow, but it will be made to grow just as fast as circumstances will permit. Surely, with so much intellectual ability, moral earnestness, business sagacity, and whole-hearted co-operation enlisted in its support, no one need doubt that all the money at disposal will be used judiciously and effectively, and made to do all that the amount could possibly accomplish. Let nobody say after this that radicals have no faith in their own ideas, or are unwilling to give and work for them. The remarkable promptness with which the subscriptions to stock are being paid in, and the generous words that so often accompany the remittances, show that a new day is dawning for American radicalism in religion. Its spirit is lofty and earnest, its objects are daily growing clearer, its opportunities are daily multiplying on every hand, and the need of it by the people at large is felt daily with increasing force. And we want to say that we mean to deserve all the help that is given us in doing our part of the good work. In one sense we need not be especially grateful for it, since the work is no more ours than theirs; but we are grateful for it, and mean to prove this by making the most of it. There is no room for vanity or self-complacency—but there is abundant room for unselfish toil, for deep enthusiasm, for profound self-consecration to the cause of Free Religion.

"OUT OF THE MOUTH OF BABES AND SUCK-LINGS."

A correspondent sends us the following illustration of a child's view of a Liturgical Service.

"A little seven year old girl, being on a visit to some friends, went for the first time the other day to an Episcopal church. While returning home with her mother, she asked:

'Mama, what was the matter with those folks? What made 'em grumble so? They grumbled dreadfully all around us; and I listened and found they were mocking every word the minister said. What was the matter with 'em?'

She afterwards called it "the grumbling church" and declined to go again."

Mrs. M. C. Bland, editor of the Ladies' Own Magazine, Indianapolis, Ind., offers to donate for Miss Wilburn's benefit one hundred copies of that periodical for 1870 (not 1871, as was stated). Whoever remits $1.15 to Mrs. Bland will receive prepaid a copy of the Magazine for 1870; and Mrs. Bland promises to send $1.00 to us for Miss Wilburn on each of the first hundred orders so received. The Magazine is unexceptionable in tone, and the offer is a liberal one. It is not our purpose to weary our readers with importunities, even for a worthy object; but it will give us great pleasure, if a homeless woman shall be enabled to secure the modest cottage which she asks our aid in purchasing.

"The mind of man ought to fly abroad and soar like the falcon, not hide itself like the owl." So says Pilpay (Fables, p. 25). The superstitious mind loves the dark. But the rational mind revels in the sunlight of freedom.

CONVENTIONS.

At the last annual meeting of the Free Religious Association it was understood that the plan, successfully inaugurated last year, of holding public conventions under the auspices of the Association in different parts of the country, would be continued. The Executive Committee have accordingly arranged for two Conventions to be held as follows:

At Detroit, Michigan, beginning Thursday evening, December 7th, and continuing through Friday, the 8th.

At Syracuse, N. Y., beginning Monday evening, December 11th, and continuing through Tuesday, the 12th.

These Conventions will be attended by the President and the Secretary of the Association, and by other members of the Executive Committee and distinguished friends of the Free Religious movement. Interesting topics, including some of the most vital questions of the day bearing on the relations of Religion to Free Thought, will be presented for discussion. Local friends are making earnest and hospitable preparations for the meetings. It is hoped and expected that attendance will not be merely local, but that people will be drawn to the conventions from the towns in the vicinity. Let the friends of free inquiry and of rational, unsectarian, and practical religion, be on the alert and gather in large numbers to take counsel together and to encourage and stimulate each other to more faithful endeavors in the cause of religious emancipation and progress. Let honest opponents also come to convince or be convinced. The hour is ripe for free and fair discussion of these greatest themes of thought and life.

Further particulars as to subjects and speakers will be given in the daily papers of Detroit and Syracuse previous to the conventions.

LABOR REFORM.

Unpaid toil, unrequited labor, liberty to work for oneself, are no longer open questions. A whole century was necessary for the education of the American Republic up to the abolition of slavery, or, in other words, to an adjustment of the Labor question in its lowest form.

The hearts and brains of our best men were enlisted in that contest, and so absorbed were they by it that the higher aspects of the question were scarcely contemplated. As a consequence the American people are one hundred years behind time, and are overwhelmed by the magnitude of the problem now pressing for solution. So ignorant are we in regard to it that we cannot even define it. An aristocracy of Wealth is discovered; and straightway some enthusiast shouts—"Down with wealth! Abolish capital!" His more thoughtful friend, however, very pertinently asks—"What do you mean by capital?" and but little reflection is necessary to reveal the indissoluble connection between it and labor. They are a pair of shears, says Wendell Phillips; and when you destroy the rivet that joins them, you destroy the instrument. One cannot prosper without the other, and whatever hurts one hurts both. Fortunate, indeed, is it that Mr. Phillips has outlived the anti-slavery conflict, and can now devote his fine mind and eloquent voice to the further uplifting of the poor and the oppressed. But even he, as he frankly confesses, gropes and feels his way. In a recent speech he said that the Labor Reform movement is an effort "to take to pieces an unjust, cruel, unsuccessful civilization, and to see where the mistake is. . . All we know is that there are uncounted millions of men that have not a fair chance in the world, and somehow or other we mean to right it." And again, in reply to the question—"What is your remedy?" he admits—"we are not prepared to tell you." When Mr. Phillips made these remarks, I presume he intended simply to indicate the significance, the tendency, of the Labor movement wherever found, and that he spoke without reference to the immediate object or interest of any party now in existence.

In view of such declaration and admission by so prominent a leader, the workingmen will do well to pause before they consent to formulate crude speculations and offer to the world a series of propositions notably destructive, and only destructive, with the assumption that their prompt acceptance is the undoubted duty of their fellows. And yet, strangely enough with the assent of Mr. Phillips, the Labor Reform party in Massachusetts has committed this blunder. The platform adopted is so positive in tone and so absolute in its demands, that we are compelled to believe the men who profess to stand upon it deem themselves as competent to deal with all the possibilities, the delicate complications and intricacies of this social question, as the best of them is to perform a day's work.

It is wisdom to "take to pieces," if you mean by that to investigate the present forms of civilization with a view to an equitable re-adjustment of social relations; but it is presumptuous folly to attempt to destroy the entire economic system of society, in the face of our inability to reconstruct or to point out the remedy for existing inequalities.

Civilization grows; it is not made; and only by the slow process of growth can we hope to attain to that state of society in which all elements shall find their just place and recognition. The Framingham platform would abolish all profit-making, and declares fierce war against wages. Now how many labor reformers have examined the system of profits and are prepared to demonstrate even the possibility of material progress and development without it? If any one of them has contributed anything to such a discussion, it has not been my good fortune to meet with it. Wages, Profit, and Capital are so closely allied that it will be difficult to strike at one without crippling all three; and yet on no account would our reformers compromise Capital; it, they bid us remember, is one half of the necessary shears of which labor is the other half. Profit, after all, is but one form of wages; and until more light is given us, plain minds will refuse to exclude it from their conception of a wise social economy. For wages, we are asked to substitute co-operation; and yet the man does not exist who can show us how one is to be substituted for the other. Association is good, Co-operation excellent; and doubtless in the progress (not in the destruction) of civilization we shall be able to develop their uses, and to enlarge their applications. But that we have arrived at a period wherein we are really to legislate them into society to the absolute exclusion of individual effort and personal remuneration, I utterly deny.

The first article of this remarkable political platform, if more intelligible to the common mind, is no more appropriate to its place than the crude declarations which follow it. It asserts that "labor, the creator of wealth, is entitled to all it creates." The proposition may be true; but to make it so, we must include in the term "labor" far more than is commonly implied. For example, it must include the ingenuity that led Dick Fitzgerald, the ignorant laborer, to apply chalk to bobbins in cotton mills, as well as the rough work he performed with his hands. The new political movement is not intended to embrace all forms of labor; on the contrary, it is to be restricted to one form. Mr. Phillips explains that "it is the man who labors with his hands, the employee, that we mean; and we move for this class of workmen, and this class alone, because they alone need our movement." Now it is manifestly absurd to talk about manual labor independent of, and to the exclusion of, other forms of labor, as the creator of wealth. No intelligent person will make such a claim. The Labor party certainly never intended to make it. Of what value to the platform is the clause as it reads? It serves merely as a fitting introduction to the undigested theories to which I have already referred, and with them tends to complicate the real issues which are waiting for discussion.

It impresses me as a sheer waste of force, if nothing worse, to declare war against our present civilization with a view to its immediate or even speedy destruction. We may outgrow, but we cannot destroy it. And precisely for this reason a political party committed to such folly must fail to win the confidence and the votes of the people.

It is by no means necessary to be able to predict the exact social conditions which will obtain when the millenium is reached, in order to form a party in the interests of the workingman. The discussion has progressed far enough to warrant the presentation of definite issues and a demand for adequate legislation. A reduction of the hours of labor; a system of finance that will put less money into the purses of the rich and more into the pockets of the poor; a system of taxation that will take twenty per cent. of the millionaire's income to one per cent. of the income of men of moderate means; the reservation of public lands for the benefit of the people; limitation to the powers of corporate capital; the extinction of monopolies; encouragement by law to co-operation in all branches of industry and trade; the ballot for women,—these and other issues of like import are the practical questions which may fairly form the basis of a political Labor party.

Cut the platform down to plain, simple statements, remove from it the dead weight of cumbrous, unintelligible theories, and go out with it to the people prepared to answer respectful inquiry. Invite criticism by meeting it fully, fairly, and with a cordial, generous welcome; and, finally, nominate for office, recognize as leaders, only such men as have character to recommend them. So much in friendly criticism of the Labor Reform Party.

R. P. H.

In the first of a course of lectures on "Rationalism and Christianity," Dr. Bellows is reported by the Boston Daily Advertiser as saying that, "in truth, religion was growing less mystic and science more so." Though often dissenting from what Dr. Bellows says, we yet admire his genius and keenness of observation of the tendencies of the age; and he never said a truer thing than the words we quote. Religion, feeling her inability to sustain her antiquated claim of supernatural inspiration, is becoming practical rather than theological, and grows more and more reticent, even taciturn, with regard to her own mysteries; while Science begins to feel her way cautiously to the discussion of problems that were once universally regarded as the exclusive property of the Church. Without intending it, Dr. Bellows corroborates the main thesis of our last Horticultural Hall lecture (THE INDEX, No. 68), namely, that Science alone is to give the final answer of educated human intelligence to the questions of God and immortality.

The Cairo Paper, published in "Egypt," shows that the peculiar style of darkness called "Egyptian" still broods over that unfortunate locality. In its issue of Nov. 13, it says:—

The Free Religionists (Infidels) of the country have organized an association with a capital stock of $100,000 for the purpose of continuing, in an enlarged and improved form, THE INDEX, a weekly infidel journal, published in Toledo, Ohio. After a six months' effort the paper announces that $50,000 of the stock has been taken. Had the editor practised the liberality in politics which he "preached" in religion, the $100,000 would have been taken long ago. By studied, persistent and slanderous misrepresentation and abuse of the Democratic party, however, the editor (Mr. Abbot) has cut off all Democratic support. He has, in fact, rendered Democratic support, or even respect, impossible."

The Cairo Paper wants to be nursed by Reason in religion and Tammany in politics. We must appeal to king Solomon to find out which mother it belongs to. Once dexterously split in two, each mother can take her half of it. But this is bad for the baby. On the whole, Reason withdraws her claim to the Cairo Paper, and lets Tammany go off with the baby unsplit.

Father Hyacinthe, in his great speech at Munich, Sept. 23, quotes from Machiavelli—"No institution can be reformed except by bringing it back to its original principles." Admitted; but by causing the adoption of the infallibility dogma the Jesuits simply carried out the "original principles" of Catholicism to their logical consummation in history, thus furnishing a new proof that logic rules in the long run. The question at issue between the two parties calling themselves Catholic is claimed to be one between corruption and reformation of the Church; it is really one between development and non-development. One party is for standing still, the other for going on; and because the latter is in the majority, the former will yet be forced out of the Church. It is the same struggle on a large scale that is going on in every Christian sect on a small one. The Unitarians of both "wings" will learn much by studying it.

A PLEA FOR MISSIONS.

BROOKFIELD, Mass., Sept. 30th, 1871.

FRIEND ABBOT:

1. I know of a college seventy-five per cent of whose income never reaches its students. It is true, that an able corps of professors is employed, lectures are delivered, and recitations daily heard. But many of the youth in attendance do not profit by them. Not more than a round dozen of good scholars are graduated there per annum. It is true, these few are good scholars,—become able, influential, useful men. But then there are not enough of them. Not quality of work done, but numbers, is to decide the question of the excellency and real profit of this concern; and in view of the fewness of the scholars turned off, I think this school ought to be denounced as a stupendous cheat—a gigantic fraud practised upon a too credulous public.

2. Then again, permit me to say you have utterly misapprehended the scope of effort contemplated by Christian missions. Not a society could accept of the limitations you impose. It is true that first of all we aim at the conversion of the heathen—not merely nominal, but in fact. But then our missionary enterprises contemplate the development of all possible resources on the part of the heathen. You have certainly read the history of the Christian missions to little purpose, if you do not understand this. Look at Madagascar, for example, and the Islands of the South Sea. The missionaries in various instances have reduced a rude language to writing, created a literature, organized schools, taught them, set an example personally and domestically of the highest Christian civilization, and, by creating the wants of a high civilization, stimulated industry, awakened the spirit of enterprise, and thus laid the foundation of agricultural, mechanical, commercial, as well as social and moral prosperity.

3. Nor have the benefits of Christian missions been limited to the objects thus directly contemplated. The indirect and secular benefits returning to our shores (you did not quite apprehend the force of the word "our" in my communication—I meant "our civilization" here in America) are incalculable. This is what I am prepared to show up. In the first place, where there is the most missionary spirit, there is the greatest amount of spiritual prosperity in the churches. Those that give the most for missionary purposes are also the most active at home; and those who are the most interested in foreign missions also do the most for the home work—for home evangelization. All this in addition to the reflex secular advantages of missions.

4. Another thought. Commerce, rightly directed, is a mighty civilizing agency; but left to itself, working simply in the line of its own interest, it is a blind Polyphemus—just as likely to do evil as to work righteousness. What has commerce done for China but to force opium upon her, and that at the cannon's mouth? Not Christianity, in any sense, but commerce it is, that is responsible for this. The East India Company and the Government of Great Britain never lifted a finger towards civilizing the heathen of India, until finally the missionaries interfered and forced the government to patronize Christian institutions, rather than those of idolatry and paganism. And in the Sandwich Islands, from the first, one of the chief difficulties with which the missionaries have had to contend has been the commercial contact of the native population with civilization. Commerce, as a civilizer, is altogether worthless without the sanctifying influence of intelligence and virtue. Like Swiss mercenaries, it is equally ready to do service in the ranks of sin or under the banner of righteousness; to forge cannon balls or to print New Testaments; to navigate a corsair's vessel or a missionary's ship. What does commerce care whether slavery, or idolatry, or temperance, or any other iniquity is voted up or down? What has it ever cared, in this country or others, so long only as money is made?

5. Finally. It seems to me you are wide of the mark in attempting to estimate the value of missions commercially, by any standard of dollars and cents. This is even worse than the orthodox standard commercial theory of the atonement. Leaving out the question of the influence of a moral transformation upon the future of the soul (and yet how can you leave it out?), is the development of character—of manhood—to be made a matter of barter, of cold money calculation? And are our interest in, and our attempt to "redeem, regenerate and disenthral" humanity to be affected, stifled, choked off, by any consideration of difficulties, or expense? Is this an evidence of liberal culture? Is this the way to awaken what the author of "Ecce Homo" calls the "enthusiasm of humanity?" This enthusiasm is one that should know no bounds,—take no counsel of flesh and blood. It should be as universal in its aspirations and objects as the God that inspires it, the eternity that environs it, the humanity it would redeem. Instead, therefore, my eloquent friend, of carping at and criticising and seeming to condemn and to throw cold water upon the well-meant and really successful enterprises of others, lift up that far-reaching voice of yours, and say: "Come on, my followers. Let us try and emulate, at least, the zeal of those orthodox people, however mistaken, and do what we may to bless and save our race."

R. H. HOWARD.

[1. If the college above mentioned promised to educate the whole world, and collected funds on the strength of this promise, it should be "denounced as a stupendous cheat." Let the missionary boards frankly admit that the conversion of the whole world to Christianity is impossible, and promise only to convert what they can; and then their enterprise will be at least entirely legitimate.

2. So far as missionaries work for civilization, they are useful; and this we fully conceded. But civilization is not a proper part of missionary work, though the increasing attention paid to it by missionaries shows that Christianity is imperceptibly losing its sway over their minds. The sole legitimate object of Christian missions, as confessed by the best missionary authorities, is to convert mankind to Christ.

3. It is true that churches flourish in proportion as they are filled with the missionary spirit. What we wish is that this spirit should be more enlightened and directed to better objects.

4. It is true that commerce does harm as well as good. But the good preponderates. It is the indirect results of commerce—the increased communication of mankind with each other, the stimulus given to productive industry, &c.—that civilize barbarous communities. Ships, railroads, telegraphs have done more for human brotherhood than all the sermons ever preached.

5. We have by no means estimated the value of missions by dollars and cents. We estimate it by the intrinsic worth of the object proposed, namely, the conversion of the whole world to Christianity. This object we believe to be of very little value. What we measured by dollars and cents was the efficiency of the missionary system. We are the last to throw cold water on generous enthusiasm; but we want to see enthusiasm guided by wisdom. Missionary zeal for true ideas we value above all price. The question recurs—"What are true ideas?" And so the discussion comes back to the relative truth and worth of Christianity and Free Religion.—ED.]

A STORY WITH A MORAL.

INDIANAPOLIS, NOV. 12, 1871.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—From the press of business that overwhelms me, I must snatch a moment to be used in congratulating you and your friends, yes, all humanity of this age and all succeeding ages, upon the success of your INDEX Association in securing subscriptions to its capital stock. When your announcement reached me that the $50,000 had been secured, I felt as I did when Lincoln was nominated for President in 1860—only more so.

That event was prophetic of perfect political freedom—this of a still more important event, emancipation of society from spiritual and intellectual bondage. Your brave INDEX is no longer an experiment, thanks to the noble and true sons of God who have stood by you and aided you, and to you.

While my pen is dipped, I must give you an anecdote illustrating the superior moral and reformatory power of truth over error.

There resides in one of our Hoosier cities a radical who has fought the battles of Abolitionism, Temperance, Free Thought and Spiritualism nobly for twenty years. Beginning alone, he met with rough treatment at first, having been egged and stoned repeatedly in the streets of his own town. Now he has won the fight, and has disciples enough to command respect, and (what is about as essential) wealth also in abundance.

Some ten years ago a neighbor of his, an orthodox Christian, became indebted to this man (Mr. D.) in the sum of fifty dollars. He neglected to pay, and a judgment was obtained. Still he did not pay, and Mr. D., thinking perhaps he really could not pay without serious inconvenience, did not press the claim. Some months since, Mr. D. delivered a lecture on "Compensation," in which he took the position, of course, that no righteous act could fail of its reward, or sin escape its full punishment. He presented the subject so strongly and clearly as to produce a most profound impression. This delinquent debtor was one of his audience. At the close of the meeting, he awaited him at the door, and, taking him to one side, said: "There is a little matter between us that I would like to have settled. I have never felt as if I could spare the amount, and I have not yet the money now. But I've got a watch (pulling out a fine gold one) that is worth more than the debt; and if you would not mind to take it, I shall feel relieved." "Certainly, my friend, that will be all right. But this is Sunday; and as I am an infidel and you a Christian, it won't do for either of us to be caught trading to-day. Come into my office any day, and we can settle the matter." He was willing to risk the watch on an experiment as to the permanence of the impression. It proved a success. A few days afterwards, his reformed Christian called and repeated the tender of the watch. Mr. D. said: "If this is to inconvenience you in the least, I would rather not take your watch. But if you can spare it as well as not, it will be satisfactory to me." "Oh, I can spare it, and I want that debt off my mind." Knocking vicarious atonement (which is only another name for moral bankruptcy) from under this man made him honest. "By their fruits ye shall know them."

T. A. BLAND.

A WORD FOR WORK.

EDITOR INDEX:—You and those who have assisted you have done a good work in establishing THE INDEX and placing it upon a permanent basis. I think that every thoughtful liberal who has read it from the first will pronounce it one of the best, if not the best, paper of the kind that was ever published. It has already done much to enlighten the world, and strengthen the spirit of liberality that is abroad. But the good work is but just commenced that this little sheet is destined to accomplish. But few, comparatively, have as yet become acquainted with it: and many who know of its existence oppose and discourage its circulation for the reason that they do not comprehend its mission. All admit that it is an honest, brave, uncompromising publication, edited with great ability; and those who have observed know that it is attracting the attention of thinking men and women in other countries as well as this.

And now that it has become the property of an association with a capital stock of fifty thousand dollars, which sum is soon, I hope, to be increased to one hundred thousand, and is to continue under the editorial charge of the present editor, assisted by those other valued names which have made its pages so delightfully interesting for the last year, to be reinforced by others of equal ability, it should have a large circulation. Ten persons should read it where one does now. And the question I desire to consider is how this increase of circulation is to be brought about. The best way, I think, is this: Every subscriber should at once constitute himself or herself an agent for THE INDEX for the locality, at least, in which he or she resides. And I believe hundreds so love the paper, that they will deem it a privilege to canvass not only their own town but the villages and towns adjoining them. They are not required, as were the early Christians, "to go into all the world," but only a small portion, in their own vicinity. And this many should do.

The association should not be compelled to offer premiums or pay a large percentage of the subscription price to agents as canvassers for the paper. The present subscribers should be willing to give a little time and labor to this work. Mr. Abbot, I understand, has given nearly two years' services to the paper. Can we not afford to give a few days to this cause? Now is just the time to commence this work. Radicals, as a general thing, are poor, and many who may desire the paper may not have the two dollars on hand. But say to them—"Give me your name, and pay me the subscription price between now and January first, and your paper shall commence with the commencement of volume third." This will give them a little time to get the money.

Now, friends, let us all go to work at once, and see how much we can do during the rest of this month, and the month of December. There should be a small club, at least, formed in every town of any size in this country. Do not wait for your neighbors, but commence the work immediately. If you only get one subscriber, remember that, if the same thing is done by others, the whole number is doubled. We have no established church to support; let us nevertheless remember that we have a religion of humanity that is deserving of all our energies in this effort to introduce it to the world.

As the editor proposes the "enlargement of THE INDEX by doubling the number of its pages" and by "securing contributions to THE INDEX from the ablest and best-known writers of the world," let us see to it that we second these efforts by giving these writers a large audience of thoughtful readers, to whom their matured thoughts shall be welcome.

H. L. G.

SYRACUSE, NOV. 8, 1871.

[If the earnest spirit shown in this letter should be shared by others, it would be but a short time before the circulation of THE INDEX would be greatly increased. Is it worth the effort? Of this our readers must judge. Very likely they perceive shortcomings and mistakes; we do, if they do not. Yet if there is real value in Free Religion—if it tends to make men and women better, or society freer and purer,—then we hope that our friends will indulge in no picayune criticism, but help us to make the paper what it ought to be. And the way to do this is to get new subscribers as fast as possible, both to the paper itself and to the Association's Stock.—ED.]

With a magnanimity hitherto unknown among criminals of his class, a murderer in Kentucky, recently, had a friend cause his arrest, draw the reward of $500, which had been offered for his apprehension, and present it to the widow of his victim. Very different from this must be the feeling of a man in Indiana, imprisoned for life for murdering a stage-driver. He rejoices that he committed the crime, believing that, if he had not "killed the man," he would have been to-day where salvation never could reach him. As it is, he thinks he has "saved himself." This is what may be termed "killing logic."—Hearth and Home.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, Toledo, Ohio

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Circulars with list of subjects will be sent on application.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

INDEX TRACTS

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION have published the following tracts, and will publish others of a similar character, if encouraged to do so by the receipt of enough orders to cover the expense:—

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no able, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Fifteen copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. It gives reliable statistics showing that, at the lowest estimate, this system would take about Forty Thousand Years to convert the world; and quotes the highest authorities proving the utter failure of the Catholics to civilize the Paraguay Indians, and of the Protestants to civilize the Sandwich Islanders, in any true sense of the word. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Fifteen copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution;" Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single Copies Ten Cents; Eight Copies Fifty Cents; Twenty Copies One Dollar.

Also, the scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition by PARKER PILLSBURY, entitled "The Sunday Question," is for sale at THE INDEX OFFICE. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion without Superstition

First Series, No. 1 to 20.

Second Series, Just Published—

21. Fanaticism: how displayed by well-meaning people in their judgment and action respecting religion in others.
22. Let your Faith honor God, not calumniate it: reject all testimony that speaks ill of God.
23. Who Wrote It? a proper and needful inquiry when an unreasonable claim is urged on the ground that "it is written."
24. Periodical Prayer: ask when you want to ask; thank when you want to thank; be honest in prayer.
25. Hear the other Side: seek an intelligent faith, instead of blindly following ignorance and prejudice.
26. Man's Duty to God: above all things do not neglect it; but take care, too, not to be misled in regard to it.
27. Penny-wise, Pound-foolish: to claim divine inspiration for unworthy imputation on the divine character.
28. A Touchstone for false Teachers: God certainly gave reason and conscience to be our guides.
29. Justice and Love are Mercy: God's actual method better than the supposed "plan of salvation."
30. Prepared to Die: an unveiling of some clerical false pretences.
31. "Even as Others?" showing a point of resemblance between the "evangelicals" and those believers whom they stigmatize as "unbelievers."
32. Do Men need Salvation? a look towards God directly, not through the dark-stained church-windows.
33. Unchangeable: will God ever refuse to welcome the repenting and returning sinner?
34. Lost Sinners: men sometimes lose their children: did God ever lose, can he lose, his children?
35. Times and Seasons: two false notions considered; one about Friday, one about Sunday.
36. Do they really believe it? cases where Orthodoxy follows tradition in opposition to Scripture.
37. The Boston Revival and its Leader: methods of operation of Rev. A. B. Earle, professional revivalist.
38. He Rejects the Bible: a false charge refuted, and the opposing truth clearly shown.

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

THE PRESENT HEAVEN.

A DISCOURSE BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

The Kingdom of God is among you.

LUKE XVII, 21.

The verse I have taken as my text is translated in our common Bible—"The Kingdom of God is within you." Either rendering is correct, but the one I give is more significant than the other. To say—"the Kingdom of God is within you"—is to say that heaven, whenever or wherever it may be, is a state of mind, and not a state of things. It does not say when heaven may be, or in what sphere it may be, but merely what it may be. It does not say that heaven is not to be looked for a thousand years hence, or in the planet Herschel; but simply that it is in the breast. But to say—"The Kingdom of God is among you"—is to say that heaven is here and now; actually present. Jesus says: "You need not be on the lookout for the kingdom. Here it is." He was the kingdom. When one child of the kingdom is present, the kingdom is present. He has the kingdom in himself. He is the soul of it. We are very sure that he was heaven to the Magdalene out of whom he cast the devils. When Jesus sends out his disciples, he bids them announce, not some future heaven, but an immediate heaven. "As ye go, preach, saying, 'The kingdom of heaven is at hand.' If they will not receive you, go out into the streets and say, 'The very dust of your city we shake from our feet.' Nevertheless be ye sure of this, ye evil ones and wicked, that the kingdom of God is come nigh unto you." And yet more significantly to the same point, talking to Nicodemus about the kingdom, he said—"No one knows anything about the kingdom of heaven but the Son of Man who is in heaven." The Son of Man who is in heaven! As much as saying—"In heaven the true man always is. For the Son of Man is the genuine man."

Here is a thought that has not had justice done to it either by critic or preacher. The burden of teaching is now, as it has been for two thousand years, and on the authority of Jesus too, that heaven is to be looked for one of these days; that the present state of things, so far from being heavenly, is much nearer the reverse. If this were a mere matter of sentiment or opinion, it might not be of much consequence; but it is a matter of belief, and that is of a great deal of moment. These words of Jesus contain one of the most vital ideas that he ever put forth; one of the most original and profound. It is an idea that goes deep down into our common life. Let us try this morning to get into it.

There are two stubborn delusions in regard to heaven which it is quite necessary that we should outgrow.

The first is that it is in SPACE.

The second is that it is in TIME.

If we could scatter these two delusions, our way would be clear to a truth of inexhaustible richness and force. In the first place, we must hunt heaven out of SPACE. For until we do, we shall feel under the necessity of going away from where we are to get into it, and of putting all actual existence under the ban. Is it outside of this world (it is always supposed to be); is it up in the air; is it away off in some starry sphere; is it beyond the sun? Then to get there, we must put away our work, drop our tools, break away from our wives and children, say good-by to our friends, throw off our bodies, and take flight through the atmosphere, in which we have never learned to breathe. See what this comes to. In order to reach heaven we must abandon everything we know and love, opportunity, privilege, humanity, whatever for the present makes us men and women. And as heaven is a state to be desired, we must wish to do this; we must long, as the apostle did, "to depart and be with Christ." We must feel but a half-interest in our work, and must go through life as pilgrims bound for some distant Mecca or Jerusalem.

Nor is this all. The anticipation of a heaven in another planet will, in almost all cases, involve the idea, that by going to another planet we shall get into heaven; the idea that Death is going to effect the change that makes us happy; that the mere circumstance of physical dissolution will operate an essential change of being, a notion as disastrous to all moral earnestness, as it is absurd in the light of reason. Heaven, whatever else it be, must be a state of Mind. The Mind is the Man. The mind thinks, feels, is conscious; the mind creates the place and the hour; makes the earth a garden or a prison, the moment a paradise or purgatory. To dream that the Mind may be left out of account in this great affair of getting into heaven—to dream that a rearrangement of dust-particles is going to be any substitute for a reconstruction of thought is about as melancholy a superstition as can be entertained. And yet this superstition haunts all who fancy heaven to be a place. They catch themselves thinking that the laws of space have something to do with it. That it is a case of chemistry or gravitation. And so the anxiety about it centres in the process by which we escape from this world, not in the relations under which we live in it. And what utter hollowness proceeds from this! For if anything in the world be absolutely certain, it is that "we mysteriously carry our own circumference" with us. For who can quit his own centre, or escape the point of view which belongs to his own identity? He who is not with God already can by no path of space find the least approach; in vain would you lend him the wing of angel or the speed of light; in vain plant him here or there; on this side of death or that; he is in the outer darkness still; having that inner blindness which would leave him in pitchy night, though, like the angel of the Apocalypse, he were "standing in the Sun."

But if heaven be not THERE, it is not anywhere but where we are. If it be not in a distant star, we are driven to the conclusion that it is on this very spot of ground, in this rocky wilderness, where a stone is our pillow; in this house where our children are laughing and crying; in these stores and offices and banks where we buy and sell and exchange money; in these factories where we mix conscience with cotton and woollen and india-rubber and paper and what-not in the manufacture of goods, or evils it may be, for the market.

Let us away, then, with this talk about "going to heaven," and in place of it put other talk about standing in heaven, or living in heaven. The substitution of the one phrase for the other would effect a revolution in life.

But there is another delusion quite as obstinate and quite as mischievous as this I have noticed. It is the delusion that heaven is somewhere else in Time; that it was in Eden, or is to be in the Millennium; that it was a good time past, or is to be a good time coming. Some look back and say—"There was the golden clime; there were the happy people; there were the ages of peace and plenty; how blessed the human lot then! When the angels moved about, and God revealed himself, and the very dust was made holy by the tread of divine feet! When men and women lived simple lives of innocence; and poverty was not, nor pain, nor disease, nor the ceaseless struggle with evil that we have; when men lived their lives out and then fell asleep!" Others look forward and say—"Oh! when will the time come, that better day predicted by prophets; dreamed of by poets; promised by preachers? When the night shall have passed, and the struggle shall be over, and the rest shall come!" They count the years; they go over and over again the sacred numbers of the Apocalypse, and fix the date of the coming kingdom, and school themselves in patience until the hour of advent shall strike.

Delusion mischievous and foolish! Mischievous; for while on the one side we deplore a heaven lost, and on the other side long for a heaven not won, what becomes of the instant day and its work? Regrets and yearnings are but wasters of existence. We are so much the weaker as we indulge in them. The utmost concentration is none too much for our immediate needs. The sun beam must be brought to a focus to make a blaze. But if one portion of our desire is flying off backward, and another portion is flying off forward, there will not be enough in the middle to save us from evaporation. Few men have power in excess of their day. It is only by husbanding all they can get together, that the average men have power sufficient for their day. Yesterday must be yesterday; and to-morrow, to-morrow. And the wall that cuts us off from either must be set up strong and high, if they are draining us of our life.

But see how foolish the delusion is. If these people who believe that heaven was in the Past or will be in the Future could go just as they are into the Past or into the Future, they would find no more heaven there than they find in the present moment. The Garden of Eden would be a poor place, sadly needing the landscape artist; no hard roads or pleasant rambles; no tender grassy lawns or delicious arbors or choice shrubbery; rather stingy of fruits and very lonely; an uncultivated forest, where the animals were much too familiar for comfort.

They would find the people in old Jerusalem very much like the people in modern Damascus, as unaware that they had a prophet among them as we should be to-day, were a Savior to come and put up at one of our hotels. They would hear the Baptist shouting his "Repent ye!" in the Wilderness, and would think Herod quite right in sending his police to watch him and putting him under arrest as a disturber of the peace. They would see a crowd gathered about a teacher in the court of the temple, or in the public street, a crowd of poor people mostly, idlers, country folks who happened to be in town; and joining them, would see a young Hebrew enthusiast, with long hair and black, burning eye, discussing the great political question of the day, the probable speedy approach of the kingdom. They would probably see nothing extraordinary about him; would have no eye for his divinity, and no ear for his humanity; and when he cried, "Hark! do you not hear the heavenly voice speaking to me?" would have said, "Poor man, it was nothing but a peal of thunder. A shower is coming up; we had better be going home. Besides the police are about; there may be trouble with these ignorant people." Yet that may have been one of the moments in the Christ's experience that now are regarded as divine spots in his story.

Let these same repiners over a lost bliss chance to pass by the shop in the narrow street where Paul sat making his tent-cloth. It might be at the very moment when the apostle was having one of his visions, did not know whether he was in the body or out of it, but at all events was in the seventh heaven. What would they see? A man past middle age, roughly clad, with his canvas and the tools of his craft about him, sitting all the forenoon, patiently at work. The incident would not be worth noting in the diary of his dullest day. Yet that moment was one of Christendom's birth hours.

Or give these bewailers of life's barrenness the power to transport themselves into the Future, is there any reason for thinking they would find any more heaven in the Millennium than they found in Eden, or Jerusalem, or Tarsus? Why should they? The grumbler would be still the grumbler. The eye would see no more than it did before; the ear would hear no more. "Is this all?" they would say.

We are compelled, then, to announce a present heaven or none. "The Kingdom of God is among you," is still the cry. "The Son of Man is in heaven," is the word of the hour. Why not? Can anything be more self-evident? Where shall we find the materials out of which to make heaven, if not here? Here at any rate is all there is. Can the stuff whereof the world is made be improved? Is not water satisfactory, and air, and light? What could be more perfect than the constitution of the material universe?

What more wonderful than the properties of nature? What more exquisite than the adaptations of means to ends, and the fitness of one thing to another? What more admirable than the laws which govern the atoms and the gases? The infinite Wisdom enacted them; the infinite Power executes them; the infinite Love animates them. What can there be that is not now? Will God ever love us more than he does at this moment? Will his love ever find better expression? What would we have? Beauty? The world is full of it. Opportunity? There is nothing else. The world is crowded with the elements of happiness. If heaven means rest, here is the divine bosom to rest on; just as warm and tender and broad as it ever was or ever will be. If heaven means action, we are solicited on all sides to engage in it. Do we live in our affections? Here are parents and kindred, wife and children, friends and lovers, people who need us and people whom we need. The heart need not complain of lacking food here; if it does, it will lack it anywhere. There is nothing else in all the universe that can make it happy, but just what it has now. Do we look for something better than friendship; better than parental, filial or brotherly love? We live in our consciences perhaps; I am sure they have enough to do, and of the very work that interests, engrosses, absorbs, delights, inspires, ennobles. Here is work every day for the gods. Some evil to remedy, some wrong to right, some error to correct, some harm to remove, some good to accomplish, some truth to plead, some nobleness to defend, some cause to advocate, some fine fellowship to join, some triumph to share, some battle to distinguish ourselves in. Why, we may stand in imagination any day, if we will, by the side of those men and women who are the glories of the race, whom all are praising, or of whom all are confessing the power. Is anything grander than personal worth and dignity? Is anything more celestial than the spotless conscience and the blameless heart? Is anything more beatifying than human esteem, veneration and love? Is anything more transporting than the sense of communion with those who are nobly influencing public opinion, who are strengthening the bonds of justice, who are augmenting the sum of honorable principle in the community, or who are redeeming the miserable from their misery, the infamous from their infamy? If there be any celestial angels anywhere, they are such as these, and we may have these here as well as elsewhere.

I don't believe the pure-hearted will find anything heavenlier in heaven than they may find here. The peace and quiet that they feel is the best that God has to give; the consciousness of being at unity with all men, of having no enemies, is something the angels cannot improve upon; the qualities of gratitude, of trust, of patience, of confidence, of joy in all that befalls, of delight in sympathy, and of rest in solitude are the only qualities of this kind that there are. Seraphs have no others, and will have no others when they are in the very light of the throne. But these qualities may be ours now, just as easily as theirs; just as easily as they will ever be ours. The happiness they confer on them may just as well be conferred on us. For it comes as naturally and certainly when they are present as color and perfume come to the flowers when they open their blossoms to the sunbeams.

Let heaven come in, and you will never say that it is far off. It will come in at door or window, or through a crevice if these are shut. Be reasonable, and it will come in at the gate of good sense. It will come in the feeling of contentment; in the absence of fret and worry; in the kindly allowance for people who make mischief; in the still long suffering that keeps the heart calm, and the rational wisdom that sees how one thing balances another, and how all things work together. Reasonable people are in heaven in proportion as they are reasonable. Why do the countenances of Quakers wear that expression of calm serenity that is distinguishable wherever you see them? Why are their eyes so dove-like, their voices so soft, their mien so imperturbable? It is because they have schooled themselves to reasonable expectations. They do not expect to find swans in every puddle, or peaches on every bramble-bush, saints in all church-people or angels in all gentle-folks.

Heaven will come in through the five senses, will rush in through the pores of the skin if we will suffer it. What more celestial than the hours of perfect health, when existence is a boon, and life is a feast; when the light paints every thing with beauty, and the air as we breathe it is a perpetual elixir; when the nervous system responds to the influences of the morning and evening; when sleep is light and pleasant, and the food nourishes, and exercise exhilarates; when the golden bowl is full of ruddy drops, and the silver chain that holds it suspended is firm and bright in every link, and we are unconscious of muscle and tissue and nerve, so ready is each to perform its part, and so quick is each to respond to the breezy call of life which thrills the frame with its summons to live and enjoy? We may make a hell in our bodies, if we will; but if we go out of this world ignorant of the heaven we may have in them, we shall lose something which Paradise will make no amends for. The idea of getting rid of one's body in order to go to heaven! I can understand why some should entertain it whose bodies have inherited the curse of some ancestor's fall, and for whom there is no natural rescue, to be had through air, light, food, climate and exercise. But how anybody should entertain the idea whose body is in respectable health I cannot understand; for such, if they do not poison themselves with drink, or weaken themselves by excesses, or exhaust themselves by over-work or over-play, may remain where they are and need no heavenly messenger to tell them what blessedness means.

Man is all symmetry,
Full of proportions one thing to another,
And all to all the world besides.
Each part may call the farthest brother,
For head with foot hath private amity,
And both with moons and tides.

Nothing hath got so far
But man hath caught and kept it as his prey.
His eyes dismount the highest star,
He is in little all the sphere:
Herbs gladly cure our flesh, because that they Flod their acquaintance there.

For us the winds do blow,
The earth doth move, heaven rest and fountains flow;
Nothing we see but means our good,
As our delight or as our treasure:
The whole is either our cupboard of food
Or cabinet of pleasure.

More servants wait on man
Than he'll take notice of: in every path
He treads down that which doth befriend him
When sickness makes him pale and wan.
Oh, mighty Love! Man is one world, and hath Another to attend him.

If an Episcopal priest could write thus two hundred years ago, we ought to be able, at least, to echo his words.

What then is wanting to make us feel that the Kingdom of Heaven is among us? A better organized society? A better regulated state? More order and harmony in human relations and interests? But wherever and whenever heaven may be, it must involve society, and society always involves imperfection and the necessity for curing it. It involves social trust, responsibility, effort. Give the certainty that improvement is possible; give the hope that it is coming; give the glad courage to work for it, and you give all the conditions for realizing a state of heavenliness in it. They who fancy heaven to be a state in which there is nothing to do, but everything to enjoy; no victory to get, but only garlands to wear, must be people who have never learned how tiresome enjoyment is. The hardest thing to bear long is joy. Men can more easily bear work for years than play for weeks. The heavenliness of existence consists in brave, hopeful effort to gain something to make the world happier. An hour of that will glorify, will make the heart almost leap out of the bosom to get room enough to beat in.

Now this satisfaction is offered to us, as it never was to people on earth before. Society is in better condition than it ever was. Bad enough no doubt—bad enough to need all the mending it can get; bad enough to give wholesome exercise to all who are disposed to make it better. Faith, hope and charity have a capital field for practice. Manly and womanly devotion have a brave school. Enthusiasm for humanity may give itself full swing; aspiration may have its transfiguring Mounts in every street. But we know that the world is improvable—we are sure it is improving; we are clear as to the way in which the improvement may be effected. We hold the position of advantage, and are confident of victory. We have all the splendid excitement of battle undimmed by the fear of defeat. We have the celestial glow that comes with the consciousness that in one way or in another we are making a contribution to human welfare—are doing what God does all the time, and is God-like in doing. We have all this, whoever we are who have live hearts in our bosoms; and who can long for heaven that has this? "Here we are, and if we will tarry a little, we may come to learn that all is best. Let us see to it only that we are here, and art and nature, hope and fate, friends, angels and the Supreme Being shall not be absent from the chamber where we sit. The Jerseys were handsome ground enough for Washington to tread, and London streets for the feet of Milton."

The world looked dark and evil on the bright autumn morning when John Brown was led out to die. A deed of heroism had seemed to fail; an enterprise for humanity had been thwarted. The old curse was apparently newly and more desperately riveted on the soil. But John Brown, as he mounted the cart that bore him to the scaffold, saw something else; his eye took in the sunshine and measured the landscape; his prophetic glance beheld the sunshine that was streaming down from other skies, and measured the circle of a larger horizon than was bounded by the Virginia hills. As he lifted the black child in his arms and kissed it, he was sure that all her race would receive the white man's blessing. And he caught the glimmer of the distant day when on that very soil the negro should be lifted up by white men's hands. He had fought his fight and was ready to be offered. The old man is not more truly in heaven now than he was in that moment.

The question is not what do we see? but what do we see with? It is easy to feel that the Kingdom of Heaven is away off; but it is as easy to feel that it is among us.

There was much agitation of mind somewhere since on account of the liberation of Mr. Davis, and the way in which it was effected. The facts were all known through the papers; the agitation centred in the judgment on the facts, and that judgment differed so, that while to one set of people the pillars of equity seemed to be giving way and the guarantees of law vanishing, to another set of people the majestic reign of nobleness seemed to be coming in. One said "chaos is imminent," and another said: "The Kingdom is at hand." One said treason had been pronounced no crime, and henceforth they who choose to make war against their country may do it with impunity. The other said—"Treason is brought under the cognizance of law, and where the authority of simple law is recognized, treason becomes impossible." One says: "The bailing of Mr. Davis shows a good nature that was little short of criminal in view of the terrible nature of his guilt, and the possible consequences of his immunity." The other said—"The bailing of Mr. Davis showed a generous desire that the government should be simply just—should postpone the punishment of a man till he had been tried, and if it was not ready to try him, should release him under pledges until it was." The one says—"So Mr. Davis gets no punishment, and neither justice nor law is satisfied." The other says—"He has already received the punishment of complete and humiliating overthrow; the punishment of an utter defeat, not only of his immediate enterprise, but of his life-long purpose and hope; the punishment of popular indifference and public scorn, to a proud man most terrible of any; the punishment of broken health and ruined fortunes, the punishment of knowing that his own slaves will be his masters and will have more political influence than he; the punishment of dragging out the rest of his existence in the obscurity and disgrace that await the defeated; possibly also in the sorrow and remorse that await the guilty, the punishment inflicted on him by the contemptuous magnanimity of a great people who, having crushed his principle, care nothing about his person, and by the lofty moral sense of all civilized mankind, whose eyes are now fully opened to the stupendousness of his blunders. Even in New York he excites no interest. It was worth while to let him go, if only to prove how dead he was here—how corpse-like he could be in his hotel; how completely the waves and billows have gone over him."

In dream I saw a traitor throned; and lo!
Beneath his throne there grew a grievous plit,
That yawning slowly 'gan engulfing it;
All trembling then the sceptred imp cried—"Hot Give help!" An army flew and from that woe
Redeeming, set him on a marble plain;
But see! the marble yields! then help was vain;
He sinks, and vengeful floods around him flow;
Then up an Alp they bear him, plant him high
And boast—"Thy throne this granite will uphold,
And make thee king, companion of the sky;
Mating the splendors with the morning gold."
The crag's a crater's throat while yet they cry,
And the stern fates their lawful prey unfold.

To such as Mr. Davis the freedom of the earth is simply the freedom of hell; the longer his tether, the wider his perdition; the freer his range, the more multiplied his dangers; compared with his present state, his condition in Fortress Monroe was one of safety and ease. If it is courage that lets him go; if it is self-reliance; if it is confidence in law and principle; if it is the cool magnanimity of power; if it is the subsidence of malignity and revenge; if it is faith that the last result of the civil war will be best secured by the full development of all the agencies of peace; if it be the conviction that society is sufficiently well organized to rely on its intelligence and its equity for its protection; then we may surely say—"The Kingdom of Heaven is among us," for of all the evidences of the kingdom's presence, none are so conclusive as these, and it is just as easy to believe that the action of last week was due to these great causes as to the mean ones which so many see at work in the business.

Is it said that the power to see the Kingdom of God among us depends on the disposition to see it, and that the disposition is not given to all? Of course it depends on the disposition, and must always depend on it; will depend on it a thousand years hence as much as now; will depend on it in the Millennium as much as now. You have heard the parable of the excellent but fastidious and exclusive gentleman who, being ushered into heaven, stopped short on the threshold, snuffed the air loftily and remarked that he was surprised at witnessing so promiscuous an assemblage.

But if the disposition in question be necessary, why not get it now? It is as easy to be grateful to-day as it will be any time; it is as easy to be brave and earnest; it is as easy to be kind and humane; it is as easy to be loyal; it is as easy to be trusting and hopeful; as easy to be believing, is it not? Is there any lack of occasion or of inducement?

Nay, but you tell me this disposition is given to some and not to others; it belongs to a few who have peculiarly happy temperaments, which place them in heaven all the time. Then you believe in the orthodox doctrine that only the few will get to heaven, after all; that the majority are by their temperaments foreordained to perdition. For if heaven be due to disposition and disposition be a divine gift, what is to be done about it? For my part, I am unwilling to subscribe to this disabling doctrine. I believe the eye to see the kingdom of heaven among us is given to all who wish it. It is given to all temperaments. It is not bestowed by favoritism; it is not bestowed by blood or inheritance; all sorts of men may be in heaven themselves and may see the kingdom of heaven at hand. John Brown, the dark, grim Old Testament man, with his craggy countenance and his lurid heart, was in heaven on his dying day; the transcendental philosopher of New England, intellectual and calm, as far outside of Christianity this way, as John Brown was the other way, has always a serene countenance as if he had just come down from the Mount. "He believes that he cannot escape from his good;" that "the heart in him is the heart of all;" that "the highest dwells with him," and that "the sources of Nature are in his own mind, if the sentiment of duty is there." They who stoned the Greek Stephen, saw his face as it had been the face of an angel. Florence Nightingale in the bloody wards at Scutari put so much angelhood into her shadow that the dying men felt happy when it fell upon them. The heavens are opened to all minds on the same terms. What are the terms?

Trust in God and faithfulness to duty. These are the terms. Believe that all things are well, and all things are well, that is the talisman. Ask the strong ones what makes them strong; the happy ones what makes them happy; the tranquil ones what makes them tranquil; the brave ones what makes them brave, and one and all will give this answer—"The belief that all things are well. The conviction, nay, the sight that the best is the true, dismisses all particular uncertainties and fears and makes us sure that our welfare is dear to the heart of Being." Who may not have this belief? Who that thinks can help having it? The sources of it are all open and flowing. The arguments for it lie about on the ground. To look darkly upon the world is to confess one's own darkness. To say there is no heaven here is to say there is no God here; and to say there is no God here is to say there is no God anywhere, and never has been, and never will be.

In finding thee are all things round us found;
In losing thee, are all things lost beside.
Ears have we, but in vain sweet voices sound,
And to our eyes the vision is denied.

Open our eyes that we that world may see;
Open our ears that we thy voice may hear,
And in the spirit-land may ever be,
And feel thy presence with us always near.

To believe in God at all is to believe in the whole of Him; to have any God is to have a world full; the smallest atom of God is infinite and eternal; to have Him a moment is to have Him forever. Where we know the Supreme Being to be, there is heaven. But if we do not know that He is here, then heaven is nowhere. For we are here, and here is all the world there is. It is present time wherever we are; there are no tomorrows or yesterdays; there are only today. Believe in God and His Eternal Now is ours. Believe in God and the world is instantly full of noble men and women. The hours are loaded with opportunities. Great causes invite us; fellow-workers hold out their hands; providences are new every morning and fresh every evening. The air is freighted with good words and thoughts. Believe in God, and the darkness and the light will be both alike to you as they are to Him. Believe in God and evil is a shadow; death a transformation. The sunshine is always getting the better of the one, and immortality is always swallowing up the other.

THE DECISION IN THE DOVER CASE.

MR. ABBOT'S STATEMENT OF THE CASE.

DOVER, N. H., Jan. 5, 1839.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:

DEAR SIR,—Will you do me the favor and the justice to publish the following statement of facts, in correction and completion of your brief statement of last week, with reference to the recent decision of the Supreme Court of New Hampshire?

The "First Unitarian Society of Christians in Dover" was organized Sept. 4, 1827, by the adoption of the following articles of agreement:—

"Believing that the public worship of God has a salutary influence upon society by awaking and diffusing moral and religious affections, and considering there are many persons in this place who are unprovided with such means of religious instructions and accommodations for public worship as are most congenial with their own convictions of truth and duty:

"Therefore the subscribers, for their mutual and better accommodation in the premises, do hereby unite and form themselves into a religious society, by the name and style of 'THE FIRST UNITARIAN SOCIETY OF CHRISTIANS IN DOVER,' and do hereby agree to be governed in their said associate capacity by such Rules and By-Laws as said society shall from time to time establish. Such persons as are desirous of uniting with them may become members of said society by subscribing this agreement."

In 1828 a meeting-house was erected by subscription; and at a meeting of the stockholders held March 6, 1829, it was voted without limitation or restriction of any kind—"That the general custody of said house shall be under the control of The First Unitarian Society of Christians in Dover." The property was not originally donated in trust, but conveyed for a consideration; by the deed the whole management, custody, control, and use of the house was unconditionally left with the stockholders, and by them unconditionally transferred to the Society.

On the first of April, 1868, my connection with the society ceased. But steps were at once taken by many persons, some in and some out of the society, to retain me in Dover as a preacher, notwithstanding I had already, in March, declined publicly to claim any longer the Unitarian and the Christian names. It was proposed to engage me for a year as preacher to the Unitarian Society; and I said I could stay only on one of two conditions,—either that the name of the Unitarian Society should be changed, or a new Independent Society formed. My friends agreed to form a new Independent Society; and I preached to this society, not yet fully organized, for the first time on Sunday evening, April 26, in American Hall. The next day, at an adjourned parish meeting of the Unitarian Society, it was voted, 53 to 46, to give the use of the meeting-house alternately "to each of the two divisions of the society." As the Independent Society had already taken the first step in organization, this was universally understood at the time to give the use of the church for half the time to the conservative portion of the Unitarian Society, and for half the time to the Independent Society. For several years there had been but one service a day in the church, and by this arrangement both parties could be accommodated as usual. The conservatives declined to use the building at all, however, and applied in June to the Supreme Court for an injunction forbidding me to preach in the house. The Independent Society had already elected a standing committee of three, and duly sworn in its clerk; but some trifling details were still wanting to make the organization legal. In August, however, it appeared that the line of defence adopted by our legal counsel was that no Independent Society had been formed, but that I was still preaching to the majority of the Unitarian Society. I thought we had no moral right to win the suit on this ground, and in September asked my friends to complete at once their legal organization as an Independent Society. To my surprise and mortification they voted not to do so; I at once tendered my second resignation, which was accepted, and said I could never again preach in the Unitarian Church.

There seemed now to be no reason for continuing the suit, but it was not withdrawn, and on December 16 the Supreme Court granted the injunction prayed for. The ground of this decision, rendered by Judge Sargent, and acquiesced in by the full bench of Judges with the exception of Judge Doe, who delivered a dissenting opinion, and Judge Smith, who declined to act in the case, was this,—that, although the articles of agreement of the Unitarian Society stated the object of said society to be the "public worship of God," the name of the society was an important, in fact the most important, part of the compact, and constituted the property a sort of trust-fund for the support of Unitarian Christianity; that, Christianity necessarily including a belief in the "infallible" teachings of Jesus, the evidence showed me to be neither a Christian nor a Unitarian; and that, if a minority opposed, the majority of the society had no right to permit my preaching in the Unitarian church.

The petition for injunction prays for three things:

1. That the Wardens of the Unitarian Society "be forever enjoined, restrained and forbidden to hire, employ, allow, suffer or permit said Abbot, or any of his associates or fellow-disbelievers in Christianity to preach in said meeting-house of said society, or to in any way occupy the same."

2. That "said Abbot be forever enjoined, restrained and forbidden to preach in said meeting-house, or in any way to occupy the same."

3. That "said Wardens and each of them may be enjoined and restrained and forbidden to collect and pay said taxes for the support of said Abbot's preaching."

The testimony submitted to the court, however, proved these three things:

1. That the Wardens of the Unitarian Society had not engaged me to preach in the church, my agreement being made with the standing committee of the Independent Society, whose occupation of the church was warranted by the general understanding of the direct vote of the Unitarian Society.

2. That I had not preached in the church at all since the last of September, and had declared publicly my intention not to preach in it again.

3. That not a cent of the parish taxes had been used, or was intended to be used, directly or indirectly, for my support, but that, according to vote of the Unitarian Society itself, the taxes and pew rents had been applied to "lighting and heating the house."

It is difficult to see how the decree of the court can be so worded as to redress any grievance.

Your statement is not correct that "Mr. Abbot had satisfied himself that his case was not in accordance with the law." I thought, and still think, that a majority of the Unitarian Society had a perfect right to control the use of its own place of worship, so long at least as it was used in sustaining the "public worship of God." If my friends had fully carried out their promise of forming an Independent Society, and if their counsel had recognized its existence, our occupation of the house could have been forbidden only by establishing the general principle that any religious society can be prevented by a minority of its members from lending its meeting-house, even for a part of the time, to another society not of its own denomination. But that the Supreme Court would have established a principle forbidding so common a courtesy, I did not and do not believe. I ceased to preach in the Unitarian church because my friends abandoned the unsectarian ground I had supposed them to take—the only ground I could directly or indirectly sanction,—and not because I thought our action inconsistent either with law or with equity. Since the minority could have sustained public services twice every Sunday by simply acquiescing in the majority's sustaining a single service, it seemed to me, and still seems, an ungrounded complaint to say that they were "driven out of church." There has been neither attempt nor wish to infringe upon any right of the minority. While the Independent Society occupied the house for the "public worship of God," no use was made of it contrary to the articles of agreement of the Unitarian Society, except by a new interpretation of the law of contracts. Whether the mere name of a corporation legally limits a perfectly unambiguous statement of its objects is possibly not settled for all time by the present decision. But few will now question the practical importance of sectarian names, or regard it as a mere "matter of words" whether one accepts or rejects them.

The "meagre audience at the City Hall," to which the Morning Star alludes in the passage you quote, was estimated last Sunday evening at over seven hundred.

Truly yours,
FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

The condemnation by an evangelical newspaper of the beautiful hymn—"Nearer, my God, to Thee," because there is no recognition of Christ in it, is paralleled by the condemnation that Anthony Arnaud, an eminent theologian of his age, cast against an excellent and comprehensive prayer that Leibnitz repeated in his presence. "That," said the evangelical divine, "is good for nothing—there is no mention of our Lord Jesus Christ in it." "For the moment," says Leibnitz, "I was a little startled by so severe and unexpected a criticism. But I replied, 'For this reason must also our Lord's prayer and all the petitions which occur in the Acts and Epistles of the Apostles, be good for nothing; for in these prayers no mention is made of Christ or of the Trinity.' Thereupon," continues Leibnitz, "my good fellow was thrown into confusion, and we went out for a moment to take breath." The spiritual sympathies of some over-orthodox persons are more ready to respond to the name, than they are to the spirit of Christ.—Golden Age.

ALTERNATIVES.

BY MATTHEW ARNOLD.

Long fed on boundless hopes, O race of man,
 How angrily thou spurn'st all simpler fare!
 Christ, some one says, was human, as we are;
 No judge eyes us from heaven, our sin to scan;
 We live no more when we have done our span.
 "Well, then, for Christ," thou answerest, "who can care?
 From sin which Heaven records not why forbear?
 Live we like brutes our life without a plan!"
 So answerest thou; but why not rather say —
 "Ifath man no second life? Pitch this one high!
 Sits there no judge in heaven our sin to see?
 More strictly, then, the inward judge obey!
 Was Christ a man like us? Ah, let us try
 If we too, then, can be such men as he!"

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.

The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 26, 1872. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond the amount of the stock subscribed, and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

AN ANSWER REQUESTED.

The Boston Christian Register has discovered a mare's nest:—

THE INDEX thinks that "not a clear intellect in the world" can look upon the position of the Unitarian denomination with respect, because we assert at the same time our "devotion to Freedom and Christianity, and thus present the humiliating spectacle of a divided allegiance." Perhaps THE INDEX can also tell us how clear intellects regard the position of the Free Religious Association, who, by their very name, say to the religious world, "We too are religionists," and then some of their leaders exclaim to affronted atheists, "Don't be scared by our profession of religion; we consider the existence of God and the immortality of the soul open questions. Come right into our Religious Association and deny them to your heart's content."

The Register has indulged in the above argument before. We ask from the Register a straight-forward, manly answer to the following plain question—Is Buddhism a religion? If it answers yes, then it is as absurd as THE INDEX in holding that atheists may be religious. If it says no, it must find fault with mankind at large for calling Buddhism a religion. The people call it such.

The Free Religious Association simply welcome to their fellowship the Buddhist atheist as cordially as the Christian theist; and they do it in the name of religion, because they believe that religion is compatible with absolute freedom of thought. It is not clear but obfuscated intellects that discern anything self-contradictory in this position.

A word of caution, good Register. Before you rashly deny that Buddhism is atheistic, consult the best authorities. Do not take your denial on trust from a priori theorists.

UNITARIANISM AGAIN.

A friend privately writes us that our recent article on "Unitarianism" may perhaps excite a suspicion that our objections to Unitarianism are, after all, only based on a personal grievance; and may suggest a doubt whether the whole story is told. For instance, the public are not informed whether the decree of the Supreme Court may not have been made in consequence of some special clause in a bequest or deed which legally limited the use of the church building to Unitarian Christian worship.

It is true that we said as little as possible about the circumstances of the case, it being necessary for our purpose simply to show that the stringent decree we quoted had been obtained by the special efforts of leading Unitarians, and subsequently approved by the Unitarian denomination. That was sufficient to prove our point, namely, that Unitarianism is hostile to freedom of thought and speech beyond a certain limit. But we see that our friend is quite right in his criticism. We have told either too much or too little; and with considerable reluctance we now reproduce in another column a brief statement of the case which we originally published in one of the Unitarian papers, after the decision of the Court had been given, but before the precise terms of it had been made known. The accuracy of this statement has never been called in question, so far as we know; and we believe it to be exact in every particular.

It will thus appear—

1. That there was no clause whatever in any deed or bequest or other document forbidding the Unitarian Society to use their church for religious services outside of Christianity.

2. That the effect of the decree by the Court was to forbid them to use their church for such purposes.

3. That the avowed and only ground for this decree was the name of the Society.

4. That this name (Unitarian Christian) was decided by the Supreme Court to imply belief in the absolute and unmixed truth of Christianity; in the Lordship, Messiahship, Divine Mission, and Authority of Jesus Christ; and in the Inspiration of both the Old and New Testaments as a Divine Revelation of God.

5. That this decree was obtained on the application of Unitarians, aided and supported by leading Unitarian clergymen (including such men as Rev. Dr. Peabody, Rev. Dr. Lothrop, Rev. Mr. Livermore, and many others).

6. That this decree met with no protest whatever from any Unitarian publication or clergyman, and may fairly be presumed, therefore, to have given no serious offence to the denomination.

7. That the application for this decree was not made because the minority were debarred from using the church for Unitarian Christian worship, since they could have had services in the church twice every Sunday, if so disposed; but because neither they nor the Boston Unitarians were willing that the church should be used even once a Sunday for purely theistic worship.

8. That, though the majority of a Unitarian Society may wish to have purely theistic worship for a part of the time in their own church, they will not be permitted to do so by their Unitarian brethren, but will be prosecuted in the courts and deprived of all independent control over their own property simply because of their liberalism.

Such being the state of the case, we believe that it is lifted wholly out of the category of private grievances, and becomes a most important revelation of the real spirit and tendency of Unitarianism,—a revelation that we were bound not to withhold, when directly requested to “give an explanation of the reasons” why we had “little respect for Unitarianism left.”

Whether what we said on this subject really gave to any one the impression that we were actuated in any degree by personal feeling, we do not know. If it did, the impression is not a true one. We never allowed the case to become a personal matter. It was at bottom a conflict of general ideas, and we always so regarded it. The gentlemen concerned in it on the other side were men with whom we refused to hold any but kindly personal relations; and we do not believe that their opposition was at all personal. Neither was the decree finally obtained in any sense a personal grievance. Nearly two months before the Supreme Court granted the injunction, we had resigned our position and ceased to preach in the church, because the promise of forming an Independent Society had not been fully carried out, and because we could not and would not be again connected with any Christian Society. The decree in no wise personally affected us, when at last issued, although apprehension that it would be issued was the reason why the promise above referred to had not been fulfilled.

Further, even if we had felt personally aggrieved in the matter, we are not editing THE INDEX for the sake of redressing any such grievances. In one of our earliest numbers, in a lecture on "Unitarianism vs. Freedom," we published the decree of the Court as being germane to the subject under consideration. We do not remember having since referred to it, directly or indirectly. There is no being on this planet more contemptible than the editor who uses the vast power of the press to "feed fat an ancient grudge." It should not be incredible that some men are above the reach of so pitiful a temptation. So far as we are concerned, we have never used this judicial decree for the sake of gratifying any private pique, since we have no such pique to gratify. But we shall not shrink to use it from any fear of seeming to be personal. In the whole history of the Unitarian denomination, there is no fact more damaging to its reputation, as a professedly "liberal" body, than the story of the Dover decree. No wonder that the Unitarians eschew the subject. But when so many liberal people throughout the country are attracted to Unitarianism by its fair professions of "spiritual freedom," it is right and necessary that they should be informed of the real nature of this ignis fatuus—right and necessary that all the world should see how hollow are the pretensions of Christianity, even in its most modernized garb, to the glory of a genuine love of liberty. If we can but open men's eyes to the chains hidden under the flowers, and effectually warn them against a treacherous guide that comes wreathed with roses, we shall be content, nor stop long to inquire whether our warning can be possibly misconstrued. If that decree were only a private matter, we should never have mentioned it. But it is the public exposure of Unitarianism as a gilded slavery; and therefore it has needed mention.

CONVENTIONS.

At the last annual meeting of the Free Religious Association it was understood that the plan, successfully inaugurated last year, of holding public conventions under the auspices of the Association in different parts of the country, would be continued. The Executive Committee have accordingly arranged for two Conventions to be held as follows:

At Detroit, Michigan, beginning Thursday evening, December 7th, and continuing through Friday, the 8th.

At Syracuse, N. Y., beginning Monday evening, December 11th, and continuing through Tuesday, the 12th.

These Conventions will be attended by the President and the Secretary of the Association, and by other members of the Executive Committee and distinguished friends of the Free Religious movement. Interesting topics, including some of the most vital questions of the day bearing on the relations of Religion to Free Thought, will be presented for discussion. Local friends are making earnest and hospitable preparations for the meetings. It is hoped and expected that attendance will not be merely local, but that people will be drawn to the conventions from the towns in the vicinity. Let the friends of free inquiry and of rational, unsectarian, and practical religion, be on the alert and gather in large numbers to take counsel together and to encourage and stimulate each other to more faithful endeavors in the cause of religious emancipation and progress. Let honest opponents also come to convince or be convinced. The hour is ripe for free and fair discussion of these greatest themes of thought and life.

Further particulars as to subjects and speakers will be given in the daily papers of Detroit and Syracuse previous to the conventions.

CONVERSION OR PERVERSION.

Some while ago a report was circulated and gained currency that the eminent Hindu Theist, Keshub Chunder Sen, had been converted to Christianity. Considering the impression made on his mind by the Christianity of England, the conversion, if effected, must have been wrought as it was on the Jew in Boccaccio's celebrated story, who accepted as divine the religion that could stand under the ignorance, prejudice, coarseness, and sensuality of its professors. Probably some satirical fellow started the rumor, in lightness or bitterness of heart. At all events it was not true, and many excellent, even if wrong-minded, people rejoiced that it was not.

But one of our liberal clergymen sympathized with his "evangelical" brethren in deploring the incorrectness of the statement. At least the papers said that he did; and remembering certain strange things the gentleman in question had publicly said in our hearing, we could easily believe the papers, even when they asserted that the zealous divine added to his expression of regret the expression of his deliberate opinion that Christianity in any form was preferable to the Theism of Chunder Sen. A strong assertion, certainly, coming from a man whose professional attitude was that of uncompromising hostility to the form of Christianity held by more than nine-tenths of the so-called Christian world. Theism in his judgment must be no better than the "rational" Christianity which he once said was worse than Calvinism.

It so happened that about the time of the rumor and its correction, and the sorrow ensuing thereon, we read a little account of the religious life and character of Chunder Sen, as put down by some English newspaper man. According to this account, the spiritual condition of the Hindu was remarkably elevated and pure. Practically he was a devout soul, in all respects. He prayed fervently; he spent his morning hours in solitary meditation on divine things, and never appeared before men until he had searched his heart, freshened his nobler sentiments, revived his good purposes and solemnly prepared himself to meet the duties, cares, and temptations of the world,—the attentions of designing people, for instance, the flatteries of fashionable people, the dinners and suppers of the rich, the deceits and hypocrisies of the bigoted, and the many follies and contaminations of the Christian community he was living in. When he did appear he was,—so the record ran,—a perfect gentleman. He drank no wine; he smoked no cigars; he ate with great moderation; his manners were courteous to all; his speech was well considered; his opinions were weighty; his judgments were kind. Everything about him marked a man of dignity and wisdom; the peer, to say the least, of ordinary Christians, equal to the average of those we are acquainted with, and probably, in some secondary and incidental respects, superior to the specimens of mankind we meet with in modern Christian communities.

It would of course be unfair to ascribe Chunder Sen's spiritual purity wholly to his Theism. It was due in part to his oriental temperament and discipline, as much of the goodness imputed to Christianity is due rather to fine organization and happy social conditions. But something must be credited also to the Theism. To the Theism belonged the peculiar cast of the piety, its cheerful, intellectual, rational character, its tone of moral dignity which is in such striking contrast with the abject spirit of Christian devoutness. To the Theism belonged the manly air of personal accountability, as if the heart was communing with itself, the conscience squaring accounts with its own convictions, the soul adoring, not a foreign potentate whom it was afraid of and had grievously offended, but the solemn verities it delighted to recognize and felt it a privilege to obey. To the Theism may be traced the habitual self-respect, the grave, dispassionate allegiance to natural laws, which seem to be characteristic of pure Theism everywhere,—not in the meditative East alone, but as well in the busy West. The sense of immediate moral relation between the person and the Being in whom all persons live and move imparts an austere dignity to the character which more florid faiths lack.

Contemplating this picture of the Hindu Theist, we find ourselves asking what advantage he would gain by becoming a Christian. The Christians we meet, by whatever name they may call themselves, under whatever system they may live, do not encourage the hope that he would become more devout or reverential, more honest, sober, temperate or chaste, more simple in his manners, more just, true, or sympathetic, more sensible of his private responsibilities, more faithful to his public duties.

A Roman Catholic or an "Evangelical" Protestant might object radically to the type of goodness as being too austere. In their judgment the moral quality might be too prominent in it. It would be improved by leaving out something of the self-respect and substituting humiliation and penitence instead of it. The honesty, veracity, and purity might profitably be exchanged for a feeling of the vanity of life, the worthlessness of personal virtue, the confession of sin and absolute reliance on the merits of the Savior. They might call his goodness "filthy rags," and regard his linen garments as the whitening of the sepulchre.

But the "Liberal Christian" cannot go so far as that. What then? What would be the gain of conversion to a man like Chunder Sen? Why the bitter regrets over his persistent profession of pure Theism? We cannot conjecture. Perhaps it is thought that he lacks the soundness that is communicated by a belief in "historical Christianity," or the solid rationality that accompanies an unquestioning acceptance of the miraculous stories in the New Testament, or the moral steadfastness and conservative balance that are the peculiarities of the followers of Jesus, or the tenderness so conspicuous in those who are sure their religion is the only acceptable one, or the glowing zeal that is so beautiful an attribute of the Christian sectary and denominationalist. These qualities are certainly wanting in Chunder Sen; at least they are supposed to be wanting. He is not precisely what the "Liberal Christians" are; and to become what they are in the above mentioned respects, it will be necessary for him to adopt in some measure their system of mental and moral discipline. It is but natural that they should think his failure to do this a sad mistake on his part. But he may not agree with them in that opinion, and perhaps will not be alone in his dissent.

A WORD FOR THE CONVENTIONS.

As stated in the standing notice in another column, Conventions of the Free Religious Association are to be held in Detroit, Dec. 7th and 8th, and in Syracuse, Dec. 11th and 12th. The Detroit Convention will occur before another date of this paper. It will be attended and addressed by O. B. Frothingham, President of the Association, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, F. E. Abbot, Rowland Connor, Thomas Vickers, and W. J. Potter. Other speakers have also been invited, and some of them will most probably be present. At the opening session an address will be made by Mr. Frothingham, on the principles and tendencies which the Free Religious Association is designed to represent. At another of the sessions Dr. Wise will read an essay on the Character and Mission of Jesus,—which, of course, as coming from a Jew as well as from an able and scholarly man, will have especial interest; and this subject, naturally opening into the relation between Christianity and Free Religion, will be the topic of discussion for the session. At the other sessions these topics are to be discussed, which are also to be introduced by essays—"Free Religion in a Free State," and "The Doctrine of Divine Providence in the light of the Western Conflagrations." With such subjects and so many good speakers, it seems impossible that the Detroit Convention should not profitably bring together a large number of people.

Most of the same speakers will be present at the Syracuse meeting, with the addition of others and with some change of topics. Rev. Mr. Mann, of Rochester, N. Y., is to give one of the essays there. It is also hoped that Mrs. Celia Burleigh will be in attendance, and that the following question may be introduced for discussion by an essay from her, though she has not at this writing given her assent to the proposal:—"How can the education of children be made at the same time rational, free, and religious?" And with such local help as may be expected on the platform from Messrs. Calthrop, Mundy and Mills, we look for an excellent convention at Syracuse.

PULPIT DEMORALIZATION.

"The National Standard reports Dr. Bartol as stating that Mr. Beecher says he has thoughts too far in advance of public sentiment for present publication."—Christian Register.

No parent would wrong his little child by forcing upon its tender inexperience all the knowledge which his manhood holds. Just as bad is the wrong done by the teacher who ignores the conditions and wants of his flock, and forces strong meat upon babes. You must give according to men's capacity to receive; otherwise you do not really give at all. But all such reticence and withholding must be simply as a temporary and preparative thing. There must be constant progress in the development of the hearers' capacity, and the unfolding of higher views. Nothing is to be accepted as a final resting-place save the truth and the whole truth.—Christian Union.

There is something inexpressibly saddening in such avowals as these. To be sure, Mr. Beecher has the example of Jesus in his favor (if we trust the untrustworthy fourth gospel):—"I have yet many things to say to you, but ye cannot bear them now." A public teacher of religion, speaking to mixed audiences containing persons of all grades of intelligence, is morally bound to give his highest and best thought, leaving to his hearers the responsibility of rejecting the truth. He is at least bound to offer it. There is great and grave danger that he may deceive himself in withholding it,—that he may be swayed more than he is willing to confess to himself by the fear of incurring unpopularity, of diminishing his influence, of losing place and the honor of men. Such a confession as the above must deprive Mr. Beecher's preaching of all hold upon the truth-loving and the intelligent, for it reveals a politic manipulation of truth that throws over everything he says the suspicion of insincerity. What else but this has been the excuse of priestcraft in all ages for keeping the multitudes in ignorance? We want to honor Mr. Beecher, for he has done great services to the cause of human welfare. But we cannot withhold a rebuke, far more sad than indignant, when he avows openly a principle of action, as a public teacher, which we have seen again and again to work like poison in the souls of young ministers. In the name of all manliness, we denounce it,—as will every other who has a deeply rooted faith in truth.

This moral cowardice (we can call it by no milder name) is not excused by the plea that thus the preacher will "do more good"—the plea that drugs the conscience of thousands and thousands of Christian ministers. No man has any business to "do good" to others, if the doing of it makes himself individually a worse man. The end does not justify the means, and none but the Jesuit or the jesuitical will claim that it does. There is this moral defect in Christian morality, that it teaches men to value benevolence above integrity, and to judge of actions by their guessed consequences to others rather than by their known compatibility or incompatibility with self-respect. Love to mankind is no excuse for tortuous diplomacy. You can do mankind no service so great and rare as by living a life absolutely brave, transparent, true.

Christianity throws a glamour about the idea of self-sacrifice which makes men yield even their virtue for the sake of "doing good." Away with such delusion! The minister who, having voluntarily incurred a solemn obligation to utter his convictions, prostitutes his soul to the lie of silence, sets an example to be deplored. Such Christian philanthropy demoralizes the pulpit and the world.

Several weeks ago a friend just returned from Europe sent us in a letter the following story of petty bigotry, with a request to publish it which we are sorry we could not earlier comply with:—

"We had a test of English Church liberality on board the steamer Siberia. There were three ministers with us, one Catholic, one Baptist, and one Unitarian. The Catholic priest was a Dr. —, of Chicago, a very pleasant and well-educated man. One Sunday the Unitarian minister got up a paper, signed by fifty-two passengers, requesting Dr. — to give us a discourse. He was very much pleased, and promised to do it. But when the Captain was asked, he said that he could not allow it, because it was against the rules of the Cunard Steamers, which were only allowed to have English Church services."

We suspect that the Unitarian minister was a "radical." He was certainly liberal.

The Aldine for January, 1872, is one of the most beautiful numbers of a monthly magazine devoted to the beautiful in art. It is a luxury to turn the pages. With it goes a fine oil chromo as a premium to new subscribers—"Dame Nature's School;" and in it are a number of exquisite illustrations by the best American artists. The publishers are James Sutton & Co., 23 Liberty St., New York; and the price is $5.00 a year, including premium.

Mr. Weiss read one of his finest discourses in Boston, on the Chicago conflagration. Here is one of its jewels:—

"Foreign observers do not often credit us with tenderness. It suddenly appears. The invisible writing on the heart of the American people is held to the fire; the sympathetic ink comes out; it seems to have been latent over all the continent."

We hope that the first result of Tammany's overthrow will be the rescue of the New York common schools from Catholic control. Not a cent more for sectarian schools—not a day more of sectarian management. Education should be free to all; and it should be obligatory upon all.

JESUS OVERWORKED.

Rev. Jesse H. Jones, of East Abington, Mass., in the Woman's Journal writes as follows:—

Nor was I ever more convinced than I am to-day of the truth of the saying, "Jesus Christ lived on the earth and died on the cross to give woman the ballot." Not that this was his only object, or his chief object; but that it was one object. And I will add, that he came to perform a literal political work; and that Woman Suffrage is the supreme political reform in the movement which he inaugurated.

What did not Jesus come for?

What will not reverend gentlemen insist upon his doing?

"Cast thy burdens on the Lord."

As Woman Suffrage was never thought of by Jesus, so far as is known, either before or after he was born, this is certainly an audacious claim of Mr. Jones, especially when we consider the amount of work Jesus has already on hand, according to the claims of his worshippers.

To establish a never ending Jewish dynasty—to convert the entire race to his religion—to act as a general mediator between God and man—to judge the world for all time—to bring life and immortality to light, and to attend to the details of all these "big jobs" as well as ten thousand other matters, one would think, ought to satisfy even a Christian Minister. We shall by and by hear perhaps that he came to invent printing, discover America, dig the Niagara ship-canal, or elect Mrs. Woodhull to the Presidency.

But as the old, respectable, conservative Scotch Covenanters already claim that he came to interpolate the Bible and their view of it into the United States Constitution, why should he not, while he is doing that, just put in a Sixteenth Amendment giving woman the ballot?

Perhaps no better illustration than the above quotation from Rev. Mr. Jones could be found of the general idolatry of Christians, or of the unnatural and ridiculous posture in which this idolatry puts them. As society progresses, honest Christian idolaters are constantly adjusting themselves and their dogmas, as best they may, to the new truths which are developed, and which they are compelled to accept; and in so doing the "innocents" like the Rev. Jesse often put themselves and the church in very ridiculous attitudes. In casting their burdens on the Lord for him to carry, they forget that they make weak, puling babies of themselves.

A much better and honester way is the path of Free Religion, where every tub stands on its own bottom, and every one does his own work in his own way without shirking or ruling.

The Christian church claims to have outgrown Mythology and Polytheism; yet it professes to believe in a God with a character as mythical and absurd, who possesses functions and attributes as marvellous and diverse, and who has laid upon him cares as numerous and labors as great, as were those of all the gods of ancient Greece and Egypt.

The ancients multiplied their gods as the work of the gods increased. Christians only multiply the labors of their god, as their own convenience requires. Some new function, purpose, or work is attributed to him or imposed upon him, as often as a new discovery is made in science, or a new idea or reform gains a foothold in society. It sometimes happens, also, that he is relieved of labor whenever an old humbug gets exploded, and then supposed functions become extinct, and labors cease—as did the worn-out gods of mythology. The ancients had a thousand gods, more or less, with a generous division of labor among them to lighten the burdens of each. Modern Christians must cruelly overwork their one god, imposing upon him a thousand duties, and most cruelly compelling him to be the common drudge of all work, especially that which they ought to do themselves.

I wish to enter my protest, in the name of an enlightened and humane treatment of the gods, against this everlasting and cruel overloading of Jesus by unfeeling and inconsiderate Christians.

I insist upon more gods or less work.

A "PSYCHOLOGICAL CURIOSITY."

Friend

Though hast taken away my Lord, and I know not wher though hast laid him. I beg of thee to stop and think. Hast though read the bible carefully through on thy knees before the Lord asking for the light of the Holy Spirit to teach the what it means. That is the only way to know of these things. his words are awake though that sleepest Arise from the dead and come to Crist and he will give the light That is the only way we can get light. Read the promise how he said that he is more willing to give his holy spirit to them that ask him that a Father is to give his children bread. I have read your paper and my mind was filled sorrow at the responsibility which you were taking in case you should be wrong. Think for a moment how many you may misslead in this way. Your theory if true is no better than ours if false how terrible. If ours be false we have nothing to lose. for accordig to your paper we will all go together.

You stated in your paper that the religion of Christ was selfish that it loved none but its own. Which was wrong as he comanded us to love our enemies. What could be more unselfish as I am a poor writer I have sent you scripture and a tract for consideration. I only ask you as a friend to consider those things prayfully and act as you wissh you had done when the world is on fire. Ask yourself if these things should be as recorded in the Bible. I do ask you for your own soul sake to read the Bible through once careffily and prayfully and if you can prove by it and the Spirit of God that his word is not true we have no more to say. But in a matter of so great importance there is need of being sure that you are right many souls have read your paper. should you be wrong and lead them to hell. Read the answer which Abraham gave the rich man in hell because he had not obeyed the word. do stop and think Friend

ANOTHER "PSYCHOLOGICAL CURIOSITY."

NEWPORT, R. I., Oct. 19, 1871.

DEAR SIR:—

Having received a few numbers of THE INDEX, apparently from the office at Toledo, I would observe that I sometimes act the part of an atheist, at other times the part of a believer in the existence of a Deity, without expressing any opinion on the question of his existence.

I must decline receiving THE INDEX for the following reasons:

First, as an atheist, I maintain that the works of Nature were formed neither by chance nor by intelligence, but by simple, non-mechanical adaptation that existed from eternity. (I do not at present express the exact truth, but merely a statement in popular language as near as possible to the truth.)

But, even as an atheist, I maintain that in a practical sense a Deity exists; for the system of Nature operates, in many respects, like an intelligent Being, especially in punishing the guilty and rewarding the just. So, in a practical sense, the miracles of the Bible were performed; for though the Deity (so called) did not perform those miracles, he performed others much more remarkable, in forming the works of Nature.

Secondly, as a believer, I maintain that simple, regular adaptation unaided by intelligence is insufficient to account for the formation of the complex works of Nature. Therefore a Deity exists; and if he could perform the great miracle of forming the universe, he could perform the less miracles of the Bible.

But whether the first propagators of Christianity were literal believers, or mere atheists who concluded that the Deity exists in a practical sense, and that, in addressing the people, the language of the people must be used, I do not find in THE INDEX the signs of that ardent zeal for practical religion or moral righteousness which characterized the primitive Christians. Yours respectfully,

GEO. A. HAMMETT.

[Alexander von Humboldt sent to his friend, Varnhagen von Ense, a letter he had received similar to the one preceding the above, adding in a note of his own:—"One of the many inconveniences of old age is that of liability to attempts at conversion. Do you care to deposit this curious, good-natured letter among your psychological curiosities?" (Correspondence, p. 272.) We consider the two letters above given to be also worthy of a place in Varnhagen's museum, the second quite as much as the first.—Ed.]

A GLIMPSE OF MR. VOYSEY.

BOSTON, Nov. 8, 1871.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—I find the following concerning Mr. Voysey in The Graphic of Oct. 21, under the caption "Church Topics." As you may not see this paper, I copy for your personal reading.

Very truly yours,

"Mr. Voysey 'continues,' as the large placards on the sandwich-men in the street announce. We were curious enough to attend his service on Sunday morning last. There was a full congregation, in which middle-aged, thoughtful-looking gentlemen predominated, and very few ladies were present. Mr. Voysey is a gentlemanlike looking man, with a quiet, subdued manner, too much so indeed ever to attract a very large congregation permanently. The prayers were, of course, from his own 'adapted' prayer book, all allusion to the Trinity or doctrine of the Divinity of our Lord or the Atonement being avoided. A service of praise and thanksgiving followed instead of his adapted Litany, in which he has inserted a petition that God will bless and direct 'all literary men and editors of the press.' We must confess that the thanksgiving service struck us as beautiful, between each ascription of praise the choir answering with the response, 'We thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth,' after the manner of the responses in our Litany and Communion services. The Sermon was based on I Cor., viii. 7, 'To us there is but one God, His Father,' and the preacher very beautifully enlarged on the idea of the fatherhood of God, saying that the word 'Father' was the highest and best term we are able to ascribe to God, being that which we give to the highest and holiest office and relation on earth. There was much beauty and earnestness in the discourse, much that all Christians would agree with in the abstract; but churchmen would feel more than shocked at hearing him speak of 'that mendacious old Catechism,' 'the old wives' fable of the fall of man and the wrath of God,' of the doctrine of baptism as a 'sacramental folly,' and 'as making a caricature of fatherhood, whereby God acts through priestly intervention, and by rites which are nearly pagan;' of St. Paul's use of the word 'Adoption' as a 'miserable substitute for the truth,' of our Lord having 'probably learnt the Lord's Prayer at His mother's knee,' and of the parable of the prodigal son being 'the salt which has preserved the rest of the New Testament from decay.' What we admired in Mr. Voysey was all absence of parade and vulgarity. He is evidently in earnest, and though he used most scathing language in reference to doctrines he abhors, yet his manner seemed almost to rob it of bitterness."

IS THE LOGICAL OUTCOME OF KANT'S THESIS PURE AND ABSOLUTE IDEALISM?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Kant's thesis that "the real cannot be an object of consciousness," or, in other words, the doctrine that all knowledge is relative, is a fundamental principle of the Vedanta, the Buddhistic and other philosophies. Draper proposes to have a profound though reluctant admiration of the philosophy of Buddhism, and he doubts if "Intellectual Development in Europe" has produced its metaphysical equivalent. He says that Buddha taught that Ontology, or inquiry into the ultimate nature and causes of existence, is unphilosophical; for as our senses are not a reliable criterion of truth, and we cannot tell how far the external world is a phantom, and how far a reality, we can deal only with the appearances, and not with the reality, of things. So, as a thesis similar to Kant's is accepted in Asia by nearly one-half of the human race, as it is the basis of the so-called New Philosophy of Spencer, Mill, Bain, Huxley and Tyndall, whose teachings excite much popular admiration, it might justify the belief, if the argument from great men and great numbers were of any value, that Kant's thesis is "proved." But it may be retorted, that the tone of popular literature reflects the knowledge of the people, and, that as this literature does not present any recognition of the thesis, the proportion of those who accept it has not varied from the estimate of it set forth by Bayle in his dictionary two hundred years ago:—"Ever since the beginning of the world all men, except one in two hundred millions, do firmly believe that the qualities of color, &c., are in the bodies, yet it is a mistake. None among good philosophers doubts now that the qualities that strike our senses are mere appearances."

To deny that we have any immediate knowledge of an external world is to run counter to the natural prepossessions of men, who instinctively, as it were, repose faith in their senses, and always suppose that the thoughts or ideas derived from their sensations are true copies of the objects which compose the external world. I will not say with Hume, that this "universal and primary opinion of all men is soon destroyed by the slightest philosophy;" but the opinion cannot be sustained if the experience psychology be true, which teaches that nothing can be known by our mind but our sensations or states of consciousness, which produce other states called thoughts or ideas. These sensations are mistaken for impressions or representations of external objects: but sensations cannot be true copies of the external objects which operate on the brain and produce our various states of consciousness.

Yet, if any man not versed in psychological inquiries be asked if he believes that his visual sensation of a rose is a copy of the rose, and if the attributes of shape, fragrance and color do exist in it, and are not merely sensations of shape, smell and color which arise in him from peculiar excitations of the organs of the senses and the brain, which are determined by characteristics in the rose which we cannot know, he would answer yes, and regard you as a madman if you doubt it. Ask him if his idea of the sensation of pain from a burn is a copy of the fire which burned him, or if his idea of the sensation of the sound of thunder is like the object called thunder, and in these cases he will, perhaps, admit that they are not copies; yet the same persons who admit that a burn is not a copy of the fire would contend that the appearances of light and color in the fire are real copies of the fire. But these are mere names for the sensations caused in us by what we call fire, and the sensations no more resemble the cause than the pain inflicted by an instrument resembles the instrument. As the intercourse between the mind and the object is not immediate, but is carried on through the medium of the senses, which do not transmit similar impressions from the same object to all men, or even to the same men at all times, it follows that we have not any immediate knowledge of what "things in themselves" really are.

That this is so, is confirmed by the facts of color-blindness, which show that the qualities of redness and greenness are not in the flowers and the leaves of a rose shrub, but these last excite in most persons sensations a; if they perceived pink or red and green, which sensations are caused by the action of the external object in reflecting different rays of light to our organism; and as the organisms of any two human beings are seldom, if ever, exactly alike, the same rays produce different effects in different human beings; as is evidenced in the cases of Dugald Stewart, the metaphysician, Dalton, the chemist, and Troughton, the optician. These celebrated men could not distinguish any difference between the red color of a flower and the green color of a leaf; and Dr. Wilson showed that, out of 1154 persons examined in one year in Edinburgh, 1 in every 18 was color-blind, that is, confounded either red or brown with green, or purple with blue; and that this condition of the visual organs is hereditary. So with the other organs of sensation; some persons have no sensation of sweetness in sugar, others no sensation of bitterness in wormwood, indicating that the qualities of sweetness and bitterness are not in the substances, but have their origin in our organ of taste, from the influences of some unknown properties in the substances, and that some modification of that organ in some men causes them not to have the sensations of sweet and bitter from these substances; and, from the minuteness and multiplicity of the parts that make up the organs of the senses, the modifications may not be discoverable. We all know that similar food which at one time excited a sensation of gust, at another time excited a sensation of disgust. These differences in sensation cannot be attributed to any change in the quality of the food, but to some change in the condition of some organ of sensation.

From these facts and reasonings I think that Kant's thesis is "proved;" and I doubt if its "logical outcome is Idealism pure and absolute." The thesis which formed the basis of Locke's experience psychology is the same as Kant's, namely, that the real nature of the things that compose the external world is unknown, and cannot be an object of immediate knowledge. Locke affirmed that the intuition of psychology is false; that the mind has not any innate, fundamental or a priori ideas; that all our knowledge is founded on experience—on the perception of the agreement or disagreement of the ideas derived from sensation and reflection, which ideas are not true copies, but merely symbolic representation of things; and that, as we can never know what things really are in themselves, we can know only our ideas. He foresaw that idealistic and sceptical arguments might be drawn from his principles, but he affirmed that, though our senses and our intellect are not suited to give us a clear and comprehensive knowledge of things free from all doubt and scruple, they answer our purpose well enough, if they give us certain notice of those things which are convenient or inconvenient in the conduct of life.

Berkeley said that Locke's premises led to Scepticism and Atheism; to avert these consequences, he denied the existence of the unknown matter or substratum which Locke and other philosophers inferred to be the support of the qualities which produce in us the sensations which we call the image of the qualities in the object. This unknown substance Berkeley regarded as a worse than useless figment. He accepted Locke's premises that all knowledge is derived from experience, and that a knowledge of objects is a knowledge of ideas; but as objects and ideas with Berkeley are the same, he concluded that nothing exists but while it is perceived. He denied the existence of matter, and affirmed that there are not, as is generally supposed, two independent substances, mind and matter, but only one, which he called spirit. He said that there was no proof of the existence of matter; that its existence was a mere inference made for the purpose of explaining the phenomena of perception and thinking.

Hume admitted that the existence of an external material world could not be proved; but he showed that the logical outcome of Locke's premises (the "thesis" of Kant) is not, as Berkeley made it, dogmatic Idealism; and that Berkeley's arguments create Scepticism, since "they admit of no answer and produce no conviction." If, said Hume, we know but impressions and ideas, how can we know that there is anything more than these? If the existence of the unknown substance (matter) which men have inferred to explain material phenomena could be denied because not founded on experience, so the unknown substratum (mind) which men have inferred to explain mental phenomena may be denied. If matter is a figment, mind is a figment. All that we have any experience of is impressions and ideas. Matter is but a collection of impressions; Mind is but a succession of ideas. But Hume, unlike Berkeley, did not dogmatically deny the existence of an external world; and to obviate the utter scepticism which his conclusions otherwise necessitated, he said, though we can give no reason, we must believe in its existence, for we cannot get rid of the belief. Scepticism appears, then, to be the logical outcome of Kant's thesis; but some of Kant's conclusions are not in harmony with his thesis. He thought that to ground the existence of an external world on mere belief would be a shame to philosophy; and he sought to remove the shame and the dangers of Idealism and Scepticism by investigating the elements of thought. As the result of his investigation, he affirmed that the mind has some ideas independent of experience which give an indirect but positive knowledge of a God, a World, and a Soul; but as Lewes says, the result furnished Scepticism with a scientific basis and terrible weapons. It also furnished Schelling and Hegel a mystical basis for the Objective Idealism of the one, and for the Absolute Idealism of the other.

I believe, with Lewes, that Experience is the only basis of knowledge; and Experience leads to Scepticism.

INDEX TRACTS

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION have published the following tracts, and will publish others of a similar character, if encouraged to do so by the receipt of enough orders to cover the expense:—

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no abler, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Fifteen copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. It gives reliable statistics showing that, at the lowest estimate, this system would take about Forty Thousand Years to convert the world; and quotes the highest authorities proving the utter failure of the Catholics to civilize the Paraguay Indians, and of the Protestants to civilize the Sandwich Islanders, in any true sense of the word. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Fifteen copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution;" "Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution?" By Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single Copies Ten Cents; Eight Copies Fifty Cents; Twenty Copies One Dollar.

Also, the scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition by PARKER PILLSBURY, entitled "The Sunday Question," is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

First Series, No. 1 to 20.
Second Series, Just Published—

21. Fanaticism : how displayed by well-meaning people in their judgment and action respecting religion in others.
22. Let your Faith honor God, not calumniate Him : reject all testimony that speaks ill of God.
23. Who Wrote It? a proper and needful inquiry when an unreasonable claim is urged on the ground that "it is written."
24. Periodical Prayer : ask when you want to ask; thank when you want to thank; be honest in prayer.
25. Hear the other Side : seek an intelligent faith, instead of blindly following ignorance and prejudice.
26. Man's Duty to God : above all things do not neglect it; but take care, too, not to be misled in regard to it.
27. Penny-wise, Pound-foolish : to claim divine inspiration for unworthy imputation on the divine character.
28. A Touchstone for false Teachers : God certainly gave reason and conscience to be our guides.
29. Justice and Love vs. Mercy : God's actual method better than the supposed "plan of salvation."
30. Prepared to Die : an unveiling of some clerical false pretences.
31. "Even as Others" : showing a point of resemblance between the "evangelicals" and those believers whom they stigmatize as "unbelievers."
32. Do Men need Salvation? a look towards God directly, not through the dark-stained church-windows.
33. Unchangeable : will God ever refuse to welcome the repenting and returning sinner?
34. Lost Sinners : men sometimes lose their children; did God ever lose, can he lose, his children?
35. Times and Seasons : two false notions considered; one about Friday, one about Sunday.
36. Do they really believe it? cases where Orthodoxy follows tradition in opposition to Scripture.
37. The Boston Revival and its Leader : methods of operation of Rev. A. B. Earle, professional revivalist.
38. He Rejects the Bible : a false charge refuted, and the opposing truth clearly shown.

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

THE DIVINE THIRST.

[Read to the Unitarian Society in Dover, N. H., Sept. 15, 1867.]

"As the hart panteth after the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, oh God!

"My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God."

PSALM XLIII: 1, 2.

Thirst, beyond doubt, is the most intense of all bodily desires. In any high degree, it becomes the most excruciating agony. We read of men who, in the delirium of thirst, have bitten their own arms and sucked the blood. An aged sea-captain who had many years before been exposed upon a wreck at sea for three long weeks, and during that time had tasted no food but a little fish and drunk no water except what could be wrung from a few rags after a shower, told me that in a few days the suffering from hunger entirely ceased, but that the dreadful torture from thirst continued without a moment's relief until his rescue.

In our climate, water is so abundant and so good that very few of us are really able to understand what this torture is, although in a hot summer's day we may perhaps form some faint conception of it. But in the countries of the East, where caravans travel for weeks through deserts almost limitless in extent, and sometimes perish from want of water, the word thirst carries with it a terrible significance. To express, therefore, in the strongest of terms, and under a figure of speech which would be most vivid and impressive, a profound sense of dependence upon God and a deep inward craving for the spiritual life which flows from harmony with him, David could have chosen no word so full of meaning as the word thirst. This rough Hebrew king, so full of fierce and unbridled passions, nurtured in a savage age, untaught by Christianity, and moved only by the natural desires of his own soul, has yet bequeathed to us most touching utterances of the profoundest religious feeling. In vain shall we search through the New Testament for words that vibrate more deeply with the divinest passion of the human heart. Men are so blinded by their theories of inspiration, so accustomed to refer every spiritual insight to Jesus, that they fail to perceive the truth that here was a man, untutored and undeveloped by Christian influences, whose spirit has become the very harp of humanity, breathing a music which at the end of three thousand years has been unsurpassed for melody and power. Like one of those waves that roll far up on the beach beyond the crowding competitors behind it, David has left still uneffaced on the sands of time the high-water mark of his lyrical inspiration. And, in all his poems, I find no words more rich in religious power and genius than the first two verses of the forty-second Psalm.

The thirst for God! Not the thirst of this or that particular faculty, but the thirst of the soul itself,—the thirst of the whole man with all his faculties,—for the hidden Fountain-head of Life. Our various faculties, whether exercised severally or collectively, fail to find their natural objects, until they have reached and grasped Infinite Being itself. The soul thirsts for God, as it were, with many mouths; it feels after him in many directions, and cannot rest until, in all of them, it has discovered the water-brooks of God. Let us glance briefly at the different paths which lead to these cooling and life-renewing springs.

The human intellect is cheated of its prime satisfaction, if it anywhere, in all its countless lines of investigation, stops short of God. Whether it soars into the heights or dives into the depths,—whether it deals with the infinities of the telescope or the infinitesimals of the microscope,—whether it studies the supreme uniformities of law or ponders the ultimate mysteries of cause,—whether it travels back to the primary forces of all development or forward to its final destination and accomplishment,—I believe that all its activity results only in utter and irremediable discontent, if it fails to find the solution of all its problems in the stupendous thought of God. The intellect thirsts for God. The attempts of science to dispense with him are unscientific; the attempts of philosophy to dispense with him are unphilosophical. Such attempts mark only the immaturity of the human mind, or at least its warped and unsymmetrical development. The great object of the intellect is to find, in the bewildering maze of details, the central standpoint of a principle from which they can be all seen in order and harmony,—to discover the secret of a real and reconciling unity in the boundless variety of the universe. In all ages, the great problem of the master minds has been to find the One in the Many, without sacrificing either term to the other. Now I confess that it seems to me sheer fatuity to seek the solution of this problem anywhere but in Infinite Reason, Intelligence, Mind, at the very core and heart of Nature. The unwillingness of many of the leading lights of modern thought to admit a conscious God appears to me to be in reality only the reaction of one prejudice against another,—the recoil of the gun after the expulsion of ancient superstition. Out of the ferment and effervescence of the age, there must yet result the clear, pure, invigorating wine of a deep conviction of the reality of God. Yes, the intellect of man demands him, and can find no permanent answer to its queries except in him alone.

So it is with our moral nature. The perpetual antagonism between our ideal duty and our actual performance, between our conscience and our character, which fills us with unrest and makes us at times sad almost beyond endurance, can disappear in no peace but that created by Infinite Purity, flowing into our feebleness with fresh courage and strength, and rectifying our failures through the inspiration of new hope. I mean no miraculous, exceptional action; I mean nothing at variance with the admitted fact of changeless natural law. But I do mean that other fact of a perpetual flow of power into our moral nature from the universal Fountain of all power; I do mean our spiritual consciousness of dependence on a universal supply of power, and our unslaked spiritual thirst until we remove all obstructions to this supply. There is here a great practical demand for God, a great practical need of harmony with the whole moral universe, which is felt keenly in every brave battle with temptation, and admits of no proof but actual, conscious experience. Let any soul enter in earnest on the task of squaring its character with its moral ideal, and out of the pain of its own exhaustion it will cry aloud for the living God. If you have never yet thirsted for the moral strength that comes from conscious unity with all moral Being, depend upon it that you have never yet declared war to the knife against all debasing influences. From that conscious unity alone is all holiness born.

Quite as really as in this struggle with ourselves, do we thirst for God in the struggle with social evil. For the reform of any great and crying social abuse, we soon become conscious that a mightier agency than mere individual exertions is requisite. In the old Greek myth, after every fall that Antæus received in wrestling with Hercules, he arose with renewed strength from contact with mother Earth, whose child he was. So, in every defeat by human perversity, a great cause rises stronger than ever; it has only been cast back on the underlying laws of God, and returns to the conflict armed with tenfold power. Speedily will all learn this, who take upon their own feeble shoulders the enormous burden of human progress; speedily will they learn that their own thirst for God is their divinest weapon, and that the more unreservedly they trust the moral might of faith in him, the more terribly will they batter the iron gates of injustice and falsehood. Vain is the boast of individual prowess against the organized collective selfishness of mankind; yet let the divine fire of a grand, unselfish purpose burn in but a single soul,—let this purpose be fed with intense faith in the living God,—and it shall prove true, in the teeth of all opposition, that "One with God is indeed a majority." This lesson, above all others, our time has learned from the life of Garrison; and whoever, like him, strives to break the yoke of any bondage from the necks of his fellow-men will soon come to thirst for the living God. In the school of reform the truth is learned well, that in God alone, not in human genius or even fidelity, is the secret of triumph, and that he who most thirsts for God will be the mightiest of moral heroes.

As the intellect and the moral nature, so also does the heart of man thirst for God. No achievement is so vast as desire; and though man wins his prize, he straightway contemns it. Voracious of happiness, he can but whet his appetite with the largest dish of it that ever falls to his share. Ask the "successful" man, if success really gives complete happiness. There is always something to be won. All earth's triumphs together are not of dimensions big enough to fill one human soul. Was ambition or avarice ever yet content? Give desire the top of its bent, and will it not cry "more?" Human experience all goes for nothing, if it has not proved that human wishing is a basket without a bottom. Worn and torn, the spirit of man retires from the rivalries of life with a sore disappointment: puny as it is, nothing but God is vast enough to fill it. Sooner or later, it comes to learn this truth,—comes to abate its demands from the world and to multiply its services to it. Peace, joy, love, greater than human,—these we cry for in our soul, and get no content until we find. The moment life discloses to us its real meaning, we discover it to be only a hint of the God behind, beneath, within it; we are schooled by it into a dim apprehension of the true reality, and the thirst for God is awakened in our hearts. It grows very clear to us that existence is something more than dining and sleeping and money-getting. Suggestions of something in ourselves too great to be put off with the mere shows of things come into our consciousness, and stimulate our appetite for reality; and, converging into one focus, these various rays of Divine light reveal to us that our happiness consists in the rounding out of our being into the full proportions of the Divine ideal. No price is high that will purchase this. Our oneness with God, our welcome to all his incoming and indwelling influences, our repose in his presence, our trust and calm delight in his love, become to us the true contents of each day's history, and our thirst is slaked with draughts of everlasting water.

"In a cemetery near Seville," says Lady Herbert, "is a very beautiful though simple marble cross, on which are engraved these three lines in Spanish:

I BELIEVE IN GOD.

I HOPE IN GOD.

I LOVE GOD.

"It is the grave of a poor boy, the only son of a widow. He was not exactly an idiot, but what people call a 'natural.' Good, simple, humble, everybody loved him; but no one could teach him anything. His intelligence was in some way at fault. He could remember nothing. In vain the poor mother put him first at school and then to a trade; he could not learn. At last in despair she took him to a neighboring monastery, and implored the abbot, who was a most charitable, holy man, to take him in and keep him as a lay brother. Touched by her grief, the abbot consented, and the boy entered the convent. There all possible pains were taken with him by the good monks, to give him at least some ideas of religion; but he could remember nothing but these three sentences. Still he was so patient, so laborious, and so good, that the community decided to keep him. When he had finished his hard, out-of-door work, instead of coming in to rest, he would go straight to the church, and there remain on his knees for hours. 'But why does he so?' exclaimed one of the novices; 'he does not know how to pray. He neither understands the office, nor the sacrament, nor the ceremonies of the church.' They therefore hid themselves in a side chapel, close to where he always knelt, and watched him when he came in. Devoutly kneeling, with his hands clasped, his eyes fastened on the tabernacle, he did nothing but repeat over and over again—'I believe in God; I hope for God; I love God.' One day he was missing. They went to his cell and found him dead on the straw, with his hands joined, and an expression of the same ineffable peace and joy they had remarked on his face when in church. They buried him in this quiet cemetery, and caused these words to be graven on his cross."

Was not this poor, half-witted creature, who in great darkness of mind "thirsted for the living God," about as wise as the wisest of us all? What more can we say than he said in simple fashion—nay, can we say as much?—"I believe in God; I hope for God; I love God." The truest worship is this multi-form yearning of the soul, thirsting for God, as it were, with many mouths. They who thus hunger and thirst shall surely be filled. The dumb cry of our human needs is Nature's prayer, and she, wiser than all our theologies, leads us to the water-brooks of God.

A CROOKED INDEX.

[From the New York Independent of Nov. 9.]

MR. ABBOT fills three columns of THE INDEX of Oct. 28 with a reply to our article on Free Logic and Free Religion. Our readers will remember his original charge, that "it takes three dollars to send one to the heathen." At the time the charge was made we characterized it as slanderous; and Mr. ABBOT, discovering that he had been guilty of an unjust accusation, has since been trying to explain it away. We propose to let our readers see how he does it. After referring to the phrase above quoted, he goes on to say:

"1. In our understanding of it the phrase was a terse charge that the foreign mission system is enormously expensive—that, and nothing more. The words state no more, and to us suggested no more; and we meant no more when we first quoted them. It is probable that this was also the meaning of the words as originally used.

"2. It turns out that some others regard the phrase as a covert charge of either extravagance or fraud against missionary home offices, and of so outrageous a character as to have no parallel but the robberies of the Tammany Ring of New York.

"3. As soon as we perceived that this last was the meaning put upon the phrase by some, we hastened in the most explicit manner to disavow it, as not being our own. We said: 'The writer of this letter evidently understands me to hint, at least, that the missionary societies are fraudulently or extravagantly managed—a thing it never entered my head to suggest. And again: If it is a charge of financial corruption against the managing boards of missionary societies, it is enough to say that I have neither understood nor used it so.'

"4. Thus unequivocally disclaiming that we had made a charge of fraud or extravagance, we proceeded to prove the charge as we did make it—the charge, namely, that the foreign missionary system, as a whole, including all its operations and expenses, uses up three-quarters of the money expended on it in making the other quarter do all the real work that is done. This is a perfectly intelligible charge. We compared the foreign and home missionary systems to two machines. The former utilizes, we argued, at least no more than twenty-five per cent. of the power applied (i. e., the money), as compared with the latter; and we then proved that this twenty-five per cent. is altogether insufficient to accomplish the end aimed at. That is, seventy-five per cent. of the power applied to the machine is consumed in overcoming the friction, the resistance of the atmosphere, and so forth; while only twenty-five per cent. is utilized in actual work.

Ten years ago we taught Hon. David A. Wells' 'Natural Philosophy,' in which the distinction is explained between the undershot, the overshot, the breast, and the turbine wheels. A class of little girls, from ten to twelve years of age, found no difficulty in understanding that the undershot wheel utilizes only twenty-five per cent. of the power applied, while the turbine wheel utilizes ninety-five per cent. The distinction between power utilized and power wasted was easily comprehensible by the feminine mind at that early age. But [THE INDEPENDENT] finds it 'silly and meaningless!' Being thus unable to comprehend that the foreign missionary system, like the undershot wheel, is a machine which utilizes only twenty-five per cent. of the power applied," etc., etc.

We have given above the substance of Mr. Abbot's article, omitting only his personalities, which are both discourteous and unnecessary.

We wish our readers carefully to read these unequivocal disclaimers of having made any charge of fraud or extravagance, and then to compare them with the extract which we give below from the article in which the original charge was made. It will be remembered that Mr. Abbot was discussing the morality of the act of one who had paid his pledges to the missionary society by leaving unpaid his just debts—a transaction which we agreed with him in denouncing as dishonest. Having made this point against this man, and the missionary secretary who commended his act, Mr. Abbot proceeded as follows:

"Furthermore, the praise accorded by Rev. Mr. Libby to a really immoral act shows how the clergy are blinded by their own self-interest to the right relations of things. The remittance of these forty dollars was really a theft from the wood dealer and other creditors; and by accepting it, Mr. Libby really became an accomplice in the crime. We impugn the conscious motives of neither the 'brother' nor the secretary. They do not conceive the act to be proper. But rightly viewed, it deserves nothing but censure. When we are told that it takes three dollars to send one to the heathen—in other words, that seventy-five per cent. of all moneys contributed for foreign missions goes to pay salaries and keep the ecclesiastical machinery in running order—we see how easily secretaries and other officials may be led to look on all such donations as the 'brother's' as meritorious. It is necessary to praise the donors. It is necessary to encourage the belief that such donations are demanded by the 'principle of the Gospel.' This financial necessity warps and perverts the moral vision of the clerical managers of the missionary, Bible, and tract societies to an incredible extent; and from them proceed that constant iteration and reiteration of the sacred duty of giving to the cause of Christ which warps and perverts the moral vision of the laity. This is one of the great evils engendered by the dominant ecclesiasticism, which radiates moral darkness in all directions by exalting ecclesiastical necessities into paramount duties to God. Lastly, we have here a single illustration of the universal moral tendency of orthodoxy."

There is more in the same key; but it is hardly necessary to quote it. The italics in the quotation are our own. We ask all candid men to compare these two passages, and say whether they are consistent with each other. Is it true that these words last quoted mean "that the foreign missionary system is enormously expensive—that and nothing more"?

Is it true that this is nothing but an assertion that "the foreign missionary system, like the undershot wheel, is a machine which utilizes only twenty-five per cent. of the power applied"? Is there no hint of fraud in these words—no insinuation that the missionary societies are run largely for the benefit of "secretaries and other officials"?

The dishonesty of the man who cheated his creditors to pay the missionaries, and of the secretary who commended the transaction, is pointed to not as an exceptional case, but, to use his own words, as "a single illustration of the universal moral tendency of orthodoxy." He openly asserts in the one place that the moral vision of the clerical managers of these societies is so perverted that they habitually, though perhaps unconsciously, endorse frauds in getting their funds; and he insinuates, if he does not say, that they practise frauds in their use of them. In the other place he declares that he never impugned the morality of the management of these societies; but only questions their wisdom of attempting a hopeless work, and of spending money in a quixotic enterprise!

Mr. Abbot complains that we have done him a great injury by charging that he had prevaricated and dodged in his argument. We put his two statements together, and our readers can judge for themselves whether they do not more than justify all that we have said of the crookedness of his methods.

[Instead of withdrawing his charge that we were "guilty of prevarication," Mr. Gladden prefers to try to prove it. This he has a perfect right to do; but he is bound to establish his point. We are willing to lay his argument in full before our readers, and dismiss the libel with the following reply.

The Catholic Bishop Cheveras was once persistently annoyed by a young evangelical minister, who quoted numerous irrelevant texts of Scripture to disprove Catholicism. The Bishop patiently endured his impertinence for a while, but at last asked leave to put a few questions in turn. "Most willingly," was the eager reply. "Did you ever read the passage—'And Judas went and hanged himself'?" "Yes." "And did you ever read that other passage—'Go thou and do likewise'?" The young man said no more.

Mr. Gladden argues seriously as the Bishop argued in sarcasm.

The passage about Rev. Mr. Libby meant that, inasmuch as three quarters of all contributions for foreign missions produce no result beyond supporting secretaries, clerks, agents, missionaries, and other officials, all these officials naturally enough urge upon the churches the duty of making such contributions. It did not mean that, in the administration of mission-funds, the secretaries were guilty of speculation, extravagance, or any other perversion of these funds to improper uses. The proper use of these funds was to support the officials; but this fact biased the officials themselves to magnify unduly the duty of giving on the part of the churches. This bias of self-interest, warping the moral vision of the officials and leading them to praise the act of giving money which ought to have been applied by the donor to the payment of just debts, occasioned the fault that we censured. If we had meant to "hint" that Mr. Libby wanted the money for dishonest purposes, could we have said that we "impugned the conscious motives of neither the 'brother' nor the secretary?" Should we not rather have denounced his motives as rascally in the extreme? No intelligent person will say that we intended to assert or "insinuate" that the missionary boards were guilty of fraud or extravagance in the use of the funds entrusted to them. On the contrary, every intelligent person will see that what we censured was the praising of a donation for missionary uses of money which did not belong to the donor. This understanding of the passage in question makes it clear from beginning to end. Mr. Gladden's professed understanding of it makes it self-contradictory and absurd.

But Mr. Gladden takes a purely incidental statement in this passage (i. e. that it "takes three dollars to send one to the heathen"), and argues as if the whole passage was meant to prove that incidental statement. The words he italicises were not written to prove that statement, and had no reference to it. They palpably refer to the potent seductions of self-interest, which make most men blink the immoralities of any system by which they get a livelihood—seductions which made thousands of Christian ministers, for instance, defend the system of African slavery before the war. But by means of these italicised words Mr. Gladden tries to prove, notwithstanding our express disclaimer and the manifest meaning of the whole passage, that we originally intended to accuse the missionary boards of wilfully perverting missionary funds to fraudulent uses. The blame we expressed for the acceptance with praise of a really fraudulent donation he tries to twist into blame for fraudulent management of the money after it had been accepted; and the incidental phrase which we have unambiguously explained as meaning that three-fourths of all contributions for foreign missions serve only to keep the missionary machinery in operation, he tries to twist into a charge that three-fourths of the money are fraudulently diverted from missionary purposes by missionary boards. The attempt is futile. We have never charged missionary boards with mal-appropriation of missionary funds. It is our incompetent critic that has "changed the issue," not we.

One word more. Mr. Gladden complains of our "personality" because we refuse to allow him, in Ku-Klux fashion, to shoot from behind a mask. He prefers to be incognito in his attack, and to be referred to only as "The Independent." But "The Independent" is not responsible for his misrepresentations. There are gentlemen connected with "The Independent" who would scorn to make them; and it would not be just to hold these gentlemen in any degree responsible for them. If it is not "discourtesy" and "personality" in Mr. Gladden to tax us falsely with "prevarication," "the paltriest sort of dodging," and so forth, it is not "discourtesy" or "personality" in us to hold him personally accountable for the libel, and to acquit his associates of its disgrace.—ED.]

"FREE RELIGION IN THE WEST."

[The following extract is from an article by Rev. A. D. Mayo, of Cincinnati, just published with the above title in the Universalist Quarterly. Mr. Potter criticises it in another column with far more forbearance than its low and unscrupulous insinuations entitle it to.—ED.]

Every form of religion produces a special variety of social life. The cardinal principle of the Free Religious Association—a creed of creedlessness, an organized disorganization, a falling back for a new intellectual departure in all the sanctities of life—of course places the family "at the mercy of a new generalization." If even the existence of God and the immortality of the soul are open questions, certainly the restraint that a Christian society has thrown around the passions and appetites of men are but wisps of straw before the sharp instruments of those critical reformers. It has been a matter of public notoriety that ideas of family life and the relations of the sexes are circulating among large numbers of people who have shaken off Christian faith which can only end in "free divorce" and "free love." Even within the iron walls of the Boston proprietors, the community has been startled by more than one repudiation of family ties "on principle." The Richardson and McFarland scandal in New York uncovered a state of opinion in "radical" circles that forbodes no good for public purity. This extreme tendency has already split the woman's rights movement into two hostile parties on the marriage controversy. Yet so powerful still are the bonds of domestic life in New England that numbers of young men and women of superior intelligence are there flirting with these confusing sexual theories without dreaming that things are practically to be different from the sweetly ordered ways of the "best society" of the American Athens. But the West is a country without a past; a land where people "try on" their creeds with astonishing freedom. These social speculations have already borne such fruits with us as would appall the elegant people who crowd the galleries of the Tremont Temple to applaud the showy rhetoric of Frothingham, or ponder over the annihilating logic of Abbot. We see here what becomes of people, ignorant or cultivated, who cut loose from the Christian idea of the marriage relation. Our new States are strewn with the wrecks of families stranded on these reckless theories; young matrons drifting back on their mothers, abandoned by those who have sworn to protect them; children worse than orphans, tossed about between the ruptured members of a faithless household; with all the more shameless accompaniments of the gospel of free divorce toppling over into the inferno of free love. We make no charges against the character of anybody, but we assert that the whole tendency of this new gospel is towards the disorganization of the family life of our country. The man who blows up the embankment of a reservoir is responsible for every man's house swept off by the flood; and he who labors to inspire distrust or contempt for the Christian religion, and throws every soul back on its own individual reason for a "new deal" in human affairs, must not be surprised if some of the consequences of his madness come back to him in ways that appall even himself.

PLATFORM OF THE MASSACHUSETTS LABOR REFORM PARTY.

[We recently copied in THE INDEX a passage from one of Wendell Phillips's articles, containing the following sentence:—"No man, editor or otherwise, has any right to criticise a document of which he does not reproduce in his own columns amply enough to enable his readers to judge whether his criticism is fair." As our readers well know, we have conducted THE INDEX from the start upon this principle, and have been even blamed for thus reprinting matter with which our readers can have no possible sympathy. But it is enough that fairness requires this course. We do not look beyond that fact.

We are privately informed that Mr. Phillips thinks THE INDEX ought to have printed the subjoined document in the same number [No. 100] containing the article on "Labor Reform" which criticised it. This we should have done, if we had had a copy of the document. We do it now, not as a favor to Mr. Phillips (though we should be most happy at any time to do a favor to one of the noblest men America has yet produced), but rather as an act of justice which we have no moral right not to do on his suggestion. In justice also to Mr. Hallowell, the author of the able criticism referred to, we should state that he has unsolicited supplied us with the copy of the document we now use.—Ed.]

PLATFORM.

We affirm, as a fundamental principle, that labor, the creator of wealth, is entitled to all it creates.

Affirming this, we avow ourselves willing to accept the final results of the operation of a principle so radical, such as the overthrow of the whole profit-making system, the extinction of all monopolies, the abolition of privileged classes, an extended rather than a restricted franchise, universal education and fraternity, perfect freedom of exchange, and, best and grandest of all, the final obliteration of that foul stigma upon our Christian civilization—the poverty of the masses.

Holding principles so radical as these, and bearing before our minds an ideal condition so noble, we are still aware that our goal cannot be reached at a single leap. We take into account the ignorance, selfishness, prejudice, corruption and demoralization of the leaders of the people, and to a large extent of the people themselves; but still we demand that some steps shall be taken in this direction.

POINTS OF AGGRESSIVE CONTACT.

Therefore, Resolved; That we declare war with the wages system, which demoralizes alike the hirer and the hired, cheats both, and enslaves the working man;

War with the present system of Finance, which robs labor and gorges capital, makes the rich richer, and the poor poorer, and turns a republic into an aristocracy of capital;

War with the lavish grants of the public lands to speculating companies, and whenever in power we pledge ourselves to use every just and legal means to resume all such grants heretofore made;

War with the system of enriching capitalists by the creation and increase of public interest bearing debts.

MEASURES AND DEMANDS.

We demand that every facility and all encouragement shall be given by law to co-operation in all branches of industry and trade, and that the same aid be given to co-operative efforts that has heretofore been given to railroads and other enterprises.

We demand a ten-hour day for factory work as a first step; and that eight hours be the working day of all persons employed at the public expense.

We demand that all public debts be paid at once, in accordance with the terms of the contract, and that no more debts be created.

Viewing the contract importation of Coolies as only another form of the slave trade, we demand that all contracts made relative thereto be void in this country, and that no public ship, and no steamship which receives public subsidy, shall aid in such importation.

We demand that women who do the same kind and same amount of work as men shall receive the same wages; and we demand the ballot for women.

ADDITIONAL RESOLUTIONS.

Resolved, That in presenting Edwin M. Chamberlin as our candidate for Governor, we put before the citizens of Massachusetts a man who, by his early and steadfast adhesion to our movement, has fairly won the confidence of every friend of labor, with his abilities and broad interest in every humane movement will grace any station; and we summon the workmen of all this Commonwealth to give him their hearty support at the ballot-box.

Resolved, That the thanks of this Convention are tendered to the Hon. G. F. Hoar for his timely and able efforts to secure the appointment of a national commission to investigate the relations of capital and labor and examine the question of the hours of labor, and we respectfully ask his further aid in our movement.

PROTESTANT CONFESSIONS CONCERNING THE SABBATH.

[From Parker Pillsbury's Tract on "The Sabbath."]

More than half the Protestant churches in America, namely, the Baptist, Presbyterian and Congregational, if not the Episcopalians, are baptized into the name of John Calvin, as really as into the name of Jesus Christ. And yet I never found but very few, even of their clergy, who did not dispute me, and sometimes with most tropical temper, too, when I told them Calvin, and the great reformers, did not hold to the Sabbath, but on the contrary wrote most positively and pointedly against it.

In Book 2d, Chapter 8th, Calvin's Institutes, the subject is treated at great length, but a few brief specimens of the argument will be sufficient for our purpose.

"The Fathers frequently call the command for the Sabbath a shadowy commandment, because it contains the external observance of the day which was abolished with the rest of the figures at the advent of Christ."

Though the sabbath be abrogated, yet it is customary among us to assemble on stated days, for hearing the word, breaking the mistic bread and for prayer, and to allow servants and laborers a remission from work."

The same day which put an end to the shadowy admonishes Christians not to adhere to a shadowy ceremony."

Christians, therefore, should have nothing to do with a superstitious observance of days."

Paul expresses a fear lest his labors among the Galatians should prove in vain, because they still observed days. And he writes the Romans that it is superstitio to make one day differ from another."

And that is John Calvin, though only in threads. His whole argument is a perfect chain cable of vigor in reasoning and power of logic, against any Sabbath day. What can be done with it?

Now, I suppose the Calvinistic clergy of this one country must count tens of thousands, and if they know the views of John Calvin, after whom they are called—after whom they call themselves—then, in thus keeping them from the people, they are liars and hypocrites. I have no other name for them.

If, on the other hand, they do not know them, with Calvin's Institutes in every decent theological library, and with all the Sabbath Conventions and discussions of the last twenty years, where they have been presented, and reiterated, and published over and over again, and scattered in newspapers, reports, and tracts, like snowflakes, everywhere; if after all this, they do not know, then I leave this audience to baptize them with whatever name you deem proper.

Martin Luther, as quoted by Coleridge, directed like this (I have seen but the quotation)—"Keep the day holy for its use's sake, both to body and soul. But if anywhere the day is made holy for the mere day's sake, if any set up its observance on a Jewish foundation, then I order you to work on it, to ride on it, to dance on it, to do anything that shall reprove this encroachment on the Christian spirit and liberty."

The Sabbath sentiment of not only Luther and Calvin, but of all the leaders of the Reformation, may also be seen in the Augsburg Confession of Faith, framed by Melancthon and presented to the Emperor Charles V., at the Assembly of Augsburg in 1530.

"What is to be thought of the Lord's day and such like rites used in the Church?" The answer is, "That it is lawful for bishops and pastors to appoint ordinances—and that men's consciences should be bound to esteem them necessary services, and to think that they sin when they violate any of them."

Of this sort, is the observance of the Lord's day, of Easter, of Pentecost and such like holy days and rites; for they that think that the observance of the Lord's day was appointed by the authority of the Church instead of the Sabbath, as necessary, are greatly deceived.

The scriptural requirement that the observance of it should be moral, free; for it teaches that the Mosaic ceremonies are not a useful after the gospel is revealed. And yet because it was requisite to appoint a certain day that the people might know when to come together, it seemeth that the church did, for that purpose, appoint the Lord's day; which day, for this cause, also seemed to have better pleased the Church, than in it men might have an example of Christian liberty, and might know that the observance, neither of the Sabbath, nor any other day, was of necessity."

There are extant monstrous disputations, to ching the change of the Sabbath, which have sprung up from a false persuasion that there should be worship in the Church like to the Levitical worship. They dispute about the holy days, and prescribe how far it is lawful to work in them. What else are disputations but snares for men's consciences?"

But let me hasten from the Fathers and Grand Fathers of the church to Archbishop Paley, who says:

"In my opinion the transactions in the wilderness above related (Ex. xvi.), were the first actual institution of the Sabbath. The words (Gen. ii. 2, 3.) do not assert that God then blessed and sanctified the seventh day, but that he blessed and sanctified it for that reason. St. Paul evidently seems to have considered the Sabbath a sort of Jewish ritual, and not obligatory on Christians as such. (Col. ii. 16, 17.) A cessation upon that day, from labor, beyond the time of attendance upon public worship, is not intimated in any part of the New Testament; nor did Christ nor his apostles deliver, that we know of, any commands to their disciples for a discontinuance, upon that day, of the common affairs of their profession. The opinion that Christ and his apostles meant to retain the duties of the Jewish Sabbath, shifting only the day from the seventh to first, seems to prevail without sufficient reason; nor does any evidence remain in the scripture, (of what, however, is not improbable,) that the first day of the week was thus distinguished in commemoration of our Lord's death."

Archbishop Whately in his notes on the Apostle Paul, has, among much more of similar purport, the following:

"In saying that there is no mention of the Lord's day in the Mosaic Law, I mean that there is not any mention of that specific festival which Christians observe on the first day of the week, in memory of our Lord's resurrection on the morning following the Jewish sabbath but that there is no injunction to sanctify one day in seven, throughout the whole of the Old Testament. We never hear of keeping holy some one day in every seven, but the seventh day, the day on which 'God rested from all his labors.'"

I cannot, therefore, but think that the error was less of those early Christians, who, conceiving the injunction relative to the sabbath to be binding on them, obeyed it just as it was given, than those who, admitting the external obligation of the precept, yet presume to alter it on the authority of tradition. Surely if we allow that the tradition of the Church is competent to change the express commands of God, we are falling into one of the most dangerous errors of the Romanists."

But in the present case, there is not even any tradition to the purpose. It is not merely that the apostles left us no command perpetuating the observance of the sabbath, and transferring the day from the seventh to the first. Such a change, certainly, would have been authorized by their express injunction, and by nothing short of that; since an express divine command can be changed or altered only by the same power, and the same distinct revelation by which it was delivered. But, not only is there no apostolic injunction, than which nothing less would be sufficient, there is not even any tradition of their having made such a change; nay more, it is even abundantly plain that they made no such change."

This country abounds in Theological Seminaries, and in learned theologians, whose sole business is to teach the ministers who are, and are to be, the teachers and guides of the people. And it certainly is no extravagance of statement to say that whatever their pupils may know, or not know, they know themselves, every one of them, that all the preaching and pretending about one day as holier than another is immeasurable delusion or unmitigated falsehood.

A DEFENCE THAT NEEDS DEFENDING.

In our ninety-sixth number, we reprinted in full an editorial article by Rev. Washington Gladden in the New York Independent, to part of which we then replied, and to the other part of which we propose to reply now in fulfilment of a promise then made.

This article makes two leading points in defence of Christian missions.

1. It regards us as unfair in holding that the influence of foreign missions (so far as real) "in civilizing savages, in improving their morals and in ameliorating their condition here on earth," is no part of legitimate missionary work, but should rather be considered an "indirect result" of it; and the question is put—"Is it not always claimed that the Gospel of Christ is the best civilizer? Does not the religion of Christ naturally and invariably carry along with it all these gifts of civilization?"

Now the arguments of one who is confessedly a non-Christian cannot be expected to have much weight with Christians, who pay little heed to arguments of any sort which oppose their preconceived opinions. But they will probably attach some importance to the statements of their own eminent and representative men. A few of these we propose to cite—first, concerning the true and only legitimate object of foreign missions, and, secondly, concerning their relation to the spread of civilization.

The New York Christian Weekly, published by the American Tract Society, says in its issue of Oct. 7, 1871, in an editorial article on "Missionaries and Indian Civilization:"—

"More civilization will not lead men to Christ, and without faith in Christ men cannot be saved. A Christless world, in short, is a hopeless world. This was the reasoning which made a missionary of Paul, and it is the reasoning which sustains the missionary activity of the church today."

In "A Manual of the Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America," published in New York in 1868, Rev. John C. Lowrie, D. D., secretary of the missionary board of the Presbyterian denomination, thus states the reason and object of foreign missions:—

"The Sacred Scripture shows that salvation is now extended to adult men only through Jesus Christ, and through the means of grace. Thus it is written, 'whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved. How, then, shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? And how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? And how shall they hear without a preacher? . . . So, then, faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God.' Rom. X, 13, 14, 17." [pp. 12, 14.]

"The simple story of the Cross, the preaching of Christ and him crucified, is the main characteristic of the work of missions in modern as in ancient times. Protestant missionaries 'preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews a stumbling-block, and unto the Greeks foolishness; but unto them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God.' The success of this apostolic mission will become more marked in coming ages, until all nations are converted unto God. We know no other means of success; we look for no other dispensation of grace, &c., &c." [pp. 14, 15.]

In "Foreign Missions: their Relations and Claims," published in New York and Boston in 1870, Rev. Rufus Anderson, D. D., secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, has the following still more explicit statements on the same subject:—

"I know of no diversity, in the views of different portions of the Evangelical Church, as to the proper object of missions; for there is no mistaking the command on which the enterprise is founded, which is so to make known the gospel to perishing men as to induce them to repent and believe on the Lord Jesus Christ." [pp. 91, 92.]

"I am now prepared to state, in a concise but positive form, what I believe to be the true and proper nature of a mission among the heathen. The mission of the Apostle Paul, as described in the fourth chapter, embraced the following things:—

1. The aim of the Apostle was to save the souls of men.
2. The means he employed for this purpose were spiritual; namely, the gospel of Christ.
3. The power on which he relied to give efficacy to these means was divine; namely, the promised aid of the Holy Spirit." [p. 109.]

"The foreign missionary, the home missionary, and the pastor have each substantially the same object. It is to plant churches, and make them shine as lights in the world. . . . There is one disease and one remedy. Before the gospel, the unbelieving world stands an undistinguished mass of rebellious sinners; unwilling that God should reign over them, unwilling to be saved except by their own works, and averse to all real holiness of heart and life. There is power in the doctrine of the cross, through grace, to overcome this. The doctrine of the cross—as will more clearly appear when we come to the evidences of success in missions—is the grand instrument of success. Not one of the great superstitions of the world could hold a governing place in the human soul, after the conviction has once been thoroughly produced that there is salvation only in Christ." [pp. 118, 119.]

"We next inquired into the nature of the modern warfare incumbent on the churches for subduing the world to Christ. We found it was spiritual; just such a warfare as the apostles waged, with precisely their object, with precisely their weapons, and with their dependence on divine aid." [p. 303.]

"There is no political movement in the world that is commensurate with the missionary movement; none that embraces so many nations, none covering so large a portion of the globe. It is the Christian Church going forth, under its Great Captain, for the subjugation of the world. . . . The spiritual war for the conquest of the world has certainly begun, and in a manner never seen in any former age." [pp. 307, 308.]

These statements, made by the distinguished secretaries of the two greatest missionary societies in America, emphatically limit the work of missions to the conversion of mankind to Christianity, for the purpose of saving them from the wrath of God in another world than this. They exclude the idea of civilizing them in this world. But Dr. Anderson puts the case more strongly still:—

"We, also, have had substantially the same difficulty [as the apostles] in respect to the purely spiritual nature of the missionary work itself, and we have been longer in surmounting that difficulty, if we have even yet fully surmounted it. The main cause of our difficulty, however, is not one that affected the apostolic missions. It has been the higher civilization of the Christian Church, as compared with that of modern heathen nations. This has tended to confuse our conceptions of the religion we were to propagate. From our childhood our idea of the Christian religion has been identified with education, social order, and a certain correctness of morals and manners: in other words, with civilization. It is even true of us all, that the civilization of centuries forms a part of the hourly manifestations of our piety; and we seldom reflect how our personal religion would appear to casual observers, were we divested of a culture which we share with the world around us. This composite idea of the gospel (if I may so describe it), this foreign admixture, has placed the missionaries of our day under a disadvantage, as compared with missionaries in the apostolic age. It has weakened their faith in that perfectly simple form of the gospel as a converting agency, in which it was apprehended by the apostles; and also their reliance on the divine power, upon which the apostles so exclusively depended for success. This faith in God, and in his appointed means for the conversion of the world, is now the grand desideratum in the Christian Church, and in Christian missions." [pp. 94, 95.]

We cannot but admire the courage and fidelity with which this brave old man adheres to his "simple gospel," and rebukes for want of faith these modern orthodox Januses who apologize to the world for their interest in missions by pleading the services that missions render to "civilization." Civilization, forsooth! Are they ashamed of the old gospel of "salvation by Christ alone?" If so, why do they not admit the fact like men? But if otherwise, why do they not stand to their guns like this honest old veteran, and fire their shot and shell at the "civilization" that cheats the world of its "salvation?" Dr. Anderson is right. It is because their "faith is weakened;" and we have ten times more respect for the intense though bigoted convictions of papers like Zion's Herald than we have for the half-and-half, feeble, emasculated, "civilized" Christianity of the Independent. Molasses is good, and water is good; but, of all beverages, deliver us from molasses and water!

What Dr. Anderson says about the practical weakness of all efforts to civilize and Christianize at the same time, is too important not to be here quoted:—

"Our fathers, in their earlier missions to savage peoples, acting with the light they had, avowedly sent Christianity and civilization forth together, as co-operating forces. For instance, ordained missionaries to the North American Indians were accompanied by farmers and mechanics; and a farmer was sent with the first mission to the Sandwich Islands. The American Board, in its report for 1816, declared it to be the object of the missions to the Indians 'to make them English in their language, civilized in their habits, and Christian in their religion.' And, three years later, the pioneers of the Sandwich Islands mission were instructed 'to aim at nothing short of covering those Islands with fruitful fields and pleasant dwellings, and schools and churches, and of raising the whole people to an elevated state of Christian civilization.'"

"What now have been the results of experience? In the year 1833, the missions of the American Board to the Indians, with ten preaching missionaries, numbered fifteen farmers and mechanics. In 1842, with twenty-four preaching missionaries in those missions, the farmers and mechanics had been reduced to nine; and in 1852, thirty-six years from the commencement of the missions, not a single farmer or mechanic remained. You understand the import of these facts. The honest aim in sending these secular helpers was to aid the preaching missionaries. But the means were found to be inappropriate. A simpler, cheaper, more effectual means of civilizing the savages was the gospel alone.

"I should add that the missionary farmer sent to the Sandwich Islands remained there only a short time; and never since has there been a thought of sending another. Thus ended the experiment by the American Board of connecting agriculture and the arts with the missionary agencies." [pp. 96, 98.]

We have quoted this passage to show that civilization is a secondary object with foreign missions, and that, so far as it ensues, it is, as we said, purely an "indirect result" of them. The original purpose of the apostles, and the present purpose of those who have inherited their work, is to Christianize, and not to civilize; and everything else has been to the true Christian missionary subordinate and unimportant compared with the salvation of souls from the wrath of God.

It is true that some civilizing influences have accompanied missionary labors, because missionaries, being civilized men, could not leave all their civilization at home. But it is not true that the "gospel is the best civilizer." In fact, what Dr. Anderson calls the "simple gospel," that is, the gospel of salvation from hell by faith in Christ alone, does not even tend to civilize. It tends rather to barbarize, since it withdraws attention from the affairs of this world, with which alone civilization is concerned, to concentrate it on the affairs of another world. The Christian who claims that the gospel of Christ is of itself a civilizing agency shows that he has what Dr. Anderson well calls a "confused conception of the religion he is to propagate." The degree in which modern missionaries rely on mere civilizing influences is the exact measure of their "weakened faith" in the pure gospel of Christ. And it is a significant fact that the American Board have found it necessary to cease all direct attempts at civilizing savages in order to Christianize them. Instead of civilizing the heathen, Christianity is desperately attempting to get civilized itself, by giving up one by one its old heathenish doctrines. In proportion as it succeeds, however, it ceases to be Christianity. The feud between civilization and these Christian doctrines is deadly and irreconcilable; and Pope Pius IX is honest enough to proclaim this truth in his famous Encyclical. There is no such thing as a civilized Christianity. Still less is there any such thing as a civilizing Christianity.

In strict accordance with this view of the nature and objects of Christian missions, Dr. Anderson declares that education, the one great means and the truest measure of all civilization, must be held of secondary importance as compared with the multiplication of churches. He quotes the testimony of Dr. Kingsbury, missionary to the American Indians, as showing that secular education tends to disincite them to become Christians; and he also refers to the failure of the high school at Beirut, in Syria, where "the literature of Western civilization was taught through the English language." And he sums up the experience of the American Board in this direction with the following explicit statement:—

"Education, schools, the press, and whatever else goes to make up the working system, are held in strict subordination to the planting and building up of effective working churches. . . . The use of schools and the press comes under the question, how far are they subservient to the great end, namely, the rapid and perfect development of churches." [p. 113.]

In other words, everything must be excluded from mission schools which does not tend to confirm the Christian faith. No geology that contradicts Genesis—no history that tells the hard truth about the Christian Church—no science of any sort that interferes with facile belief in miracles—no literature that breathes the spirit of modern thought; one can easily guess the kind of "education" imparted in such schools.

Wherever education has been really made an object in itself, it has been found to operate unfavorably to missions. The Bombay Guardian of March 6, 1869, says:—"We were told the other day by a gentleman at the head of one of the largest of our mission educational institutions, and where a number of devoted and able missionaries have successively labored, that during thirty years there had been from it only two converts, the institution being carried on at an average expense of £1000 a year." Sir James Emerson Tennent, also, in his book on Christianity in Ceylon, says that the Chittagong school, taught by a missionary in person every day for sixteen years, and having an average of two hundred pupils, turned out only two converts. With such fruits as these, it is no wonder that the American Board manifests distrust of education, and adopts a system which strictly subordinates the school to the church.

When, therefore, Mr. Gladden thinks us unfair in regarding the crude and partial civilization that follows in the wake of missionary effort as a purely incidental and indirect result—as no legitimate or proper part of missionary work—the quotations we have made show that he must include the best missionary authorities in the same condemnation. We have accepted the view of missions and their object as taken and defended by the highest authorities; and we leave Mr. Gladden to settle his controversy with them as best he may.

2. The other point made by Mr. Gladden is the alleged unfairness of our estimate of the minimum time required to convert the world to Christianity. He says:—

"All this calculation is based on the supposition that the number of converts bears a certain uniform ratio to the amount of money expended. But the supposition is not according to fact. During the first ten years of the existence of the American Board about $250,000 was expended, and the number of converts was less than two thousand. During the next ten years the expenditure was about $750,000, and the number of converts was more than twenty thousand. The expenditures were multiplied by three, and the converts were multiplied by ten."

"Can Mr. Abbot be ignorant of the fact that the ratio of increase in all healthy social growth is geometrical, rather than arithmetical? Up to 1840 'the average annual increase' of New York City had been about 1,500 a year. Would it have been safe to conclude at that time that 1,500 a year would be the 'average annual increase' for the next two hundred years? Or would it even have been sensible to take the increase of population during the year 1840, whatever that may have been, and estimate the growth of the city by adding that amount annually to the population? Yet this is the principle on which Mr. Abbot estimates the future progress of missions."

We do not doubt that there is a very slow increase of the ratio between expenditures and the number of conversions, which, however, is more than balanced by the increase of the world's population. All kinds of business can be done more cheaply as the business grows. But that this ratio of increase is geometrical rather than arithmetical is not apparent. Let us see.

Mr. Gladden is surprisingly ignorant of the statistics he ventures to use. Any one who will refer to the "History of American Missions," published in 1840, will find on page 345 a table of "Receipts, Expenditures, and Results" of the American Board, compiled by Rev. Joseph Tracy from the "published and unpublished documents of the Board." This gives eleven hundred as the number of converts in 1830, twenty years after the Board began its operations, instead of the twenty thousand which Mr. Gladden claims! In 1839, they only numbered a little over seven thousand. For the year 1828, 523 converts were reported. The annual gains for the successive years from 1828 to 1839 were respectively 147; 330; 200; 500; 140; 60; 47; a loss of 44; 144; 415; 4,749. The reason for the sudden increase in the last year we do not find stated; but it was exceptional. No one who knows the meaning of the words "geometrical ratio" will apply them to the above statistics of growth, when compared with the expenditures for the corresponding years. In 1839, when 4,749 converts were gained, the expenditure was $27,098 less than in 1837, when only 144 converts were gained.

Furthermore, Dr. Anderson reports, as the total number of converts of the American Board in 1868, only 25,538. Even conceding the correctness of Mr. Gladden's remarkable exaggeration of 20,000 converts in 1830, his "geometrical ratio" of increase from 1830 to 1868 has only produced an additional 5,538 converts in thirty-eight years! The most charitable supposition is that he does not understand the meaning of the words; and we give him the benefit of this explanation. But he will be wise to remember hereafter the danger of playing with edged tools.

The exceptional growth of a large city like New York does not illustrate the general ratio of increase of human population, to which Mr. Gladden compares the increase of conversions to Christianity. Population, as Mr. Darwin has conclusively shown, tends to increase in geometrical ratio; but, as he has shown with equal conclusiveness, it very rarely does increase in that ratio. That the ratio of conversions to Christianity increases geometrically is disproved by actual statistics.

Instead of being unfair to missions in our estimate of the time they would require to convert the world, we were extravagantly liberal. Dr. Lowrie states ("Manual of Missions," p. 357) that the total increase of Protestant converts from 1853 to 1868, a period of fifteen years, was 70,000, or an annual average of 4,666. In making our estimate, we allowed an annual average increase of 18,400 converts. We were so anxious not to be unjust to missions, that in every case we chose the figures least favorable to our argument.

We think it now sufficiently plain that Mr. Gladden has shown a want of acquaintance with the subject he discusses which would justify a much more modest and respectful style of argument.

AN UNFOUNDED CHARGE.

About a year ago Rev. A. D. Mayo, of Cincinnati, delivered a lecture in that city in criticism of "Free Religion." A partial report of the lecture was printed in the Christian Register (and, if we remember right, in the Liberal Christian also), copied from the Cincinnati Gazette. In this report Mr. Mayo was represented as saying that—"As a body the Free Religionists are committed to the most extreme theories that prevail in relation to family life." The attention of Mr. Mayo was called to this astounding charge both publicly and privately, with the belief that, if the reporter had misrepresented him, he would hasten to make the necessary correction. Of course a public speaker cannot attempt to set right all the newspaper reports of his utterances; but this seemed a case where a nice sense of honor would impel a speaker to say that he had been misreported, if such was the fact. The charge as it stood was a most slanderous one. It was printed as if it was Mr. Mayo's own words, but without the least particle of evidence to sustain it. Yet Mr. Mayo remained silent. He allowed the accusation to pass as his own, but brought forward no proofs to substantiate it.

After the lapse of nearly a year the lecture in question has been published in the Universalist Quarterly, and reprinted in the "Star in the West," a Universalist paper of Cincinnati. We have no means of knowing whether the address is now printed as it was originally delivered or not. It certainly contains no such charge as that quoted above from the reporter's abstract. In the lecture as printed, Mr. Mayo argues that the tendency of the principles of "Free Religion" is to social demoralization. He does not say that—"As a body the Free Religionists are committed to the most extreme theories, &c." His remarks on this point are summed up thus: "We make no charges against the character of anybody, but we assert that the whole tendency of this new gospel is towards the disorganization of the family life of our country." It looks as if there might have been some revision here of the matter as originally written and reported. But whether this be so or not, in either case it seems to us that Mr. Mayo has been standing the last year in the position of having made an unfounded and slanderous accusation. He regards the Bible as "the great record of the universal revelation of God,"—"essentially true and good for all sorts of men in all circumstances,"—containing a "complete" and "ultimate" statement of religious faith; and he laments that its authority is losing ground. We would commend to him certain passages in that book against "evil-speaking" and "false accusers."

A few words now as to the charge in its present shape. Of course, if one believes that certain principles practically and naturally tend to certain very bad results, it is a legitimate line of argument to point out that connection. It is a difficult line of argument, but its legitimacy may be admitted. Mr. Mayo, however, is very unfortunate in this attempt. In order to substantiate his charge against the "tendency" of free religious principles, he makes certain loose statements that are almost as bad as the charge originally reported. He alludes indefinitely to some "repudiation of family ties within the iron walls of the Boston proprieties"; he speaks of "the Richardson and McFarland scandal" as revealing a corrupt state of opinion in "radical" circles in New York; he refers to the "split in the Woman's Rights movement on the marriage controversy"; and says, finally, that "our new States are strewn with the wrecks of families stranded on these reckless theories." And he infers, and would have his readers infer, that the principles of free religion are responsible for all these things; but no argument nor facts does he bring to support this inference. The statements are all too general and loose to found so grave an accusation upon. Free Religion was not on trial in the Richardson and McFarland case more than Orthodoxy, and it seems impossible that any man honestly seeking truth and the public good more than to make out a point in controversy could so represent it. The newspapers that came most vigorously to the defence of the memory of Richardson and the conduct of Mrs. McFarland were the Tribune and the Independent, politically classed as "radical," but showing no special favor to the free religious movement. The paper that most notoriously, and even libelously, tried to trace a connection between radicalism in religion and "free-love" theories, was that immaculate defender of social purity, the New York Herald. Mr. Mayo on this point appears to have drawn his information from the Herald.

Equally imaginary is the connection between free religious principles and the "marriage controversy" among the advocates of Woman's Rights. Or if there be any connection, it certainly is not in the direction Mr. Mayo's statement insinuates. So far as the same persons are prominent in the Woman's Rights' movement and in the free religious movement, we believe that they are without exception on the strict-marriage side of this controversy.

As to the "Boston proprieties" we have nothing to say. The charge is too indefinite. They may have been behaving very improperly, but we question if free religion can be held responsible for their lapse. So, too, when Mr. Mayo speaks of the family wrecks that he says are strewn so thick all over the West, and asks us to see in them the result of free religious theories, we must demand the proof that they are so before we accept his statement. It is said that Connecticut has more divorce cases in proportion to its population than any other New England State. Yet it is the State that has been kept most rigidly under Orthodox influences in religion. How will Mr. Mayo on his theory explain this fact? We have a decided impression, too, that if the religious training and beliefs of the parties who apply to the courts for divorce throughout the country could be ascertained, it would be found in a vast majority of cases that they are "orthodox" rather than "heretic." Can Mr. Mayo give us the history of the family "wrecks" in the Western States? Free religion, certainly, has not had very much sway there as yet except in the form of German rationalism. Is it the free-thinking German families that have been stranded in such multitudes on these "reckless theories" of marriage? Again, it is our impression that the Germans, whether "orthodox" or "heretic," are very faithful to their domestic relations. But this is only an impression,—an impression, however, which is quite as good as Mr. Mayo's statement in its present unsupported form. Let him give statistics as to the religious antecedents of the families thus wrecked, and he will contribute something of value to the discussion of the point he has raised, but now left so unjustly.

Here is another point for him to consider. The assaults that have been made in modern times on the marriage institution under the auspices of religion have all been made on the basis of a religion that claims to rest on a specific outward revelation. Mormonism claims to rest, not on reason merely, but on a special revelation similar to that given originally in Christianity and intended to supplement that. Socialism in certain religious communities, as at Oneida, makes the same claim. And Spiritualism, which is charged, though unjustly as a whole, with undermining the marriage relation, traces its origin, not to reason, but to certain marvellous occurrences transcending reason. It claims that the same sort of miracles which, it is commonly alleged, established Christianity have been performed in this day to authenticate itself. Now these facts do not seem to sustain Mr. Mayo's theory that it is the giving full freedom to reason and placing it above the authority of revelation, which is the dangerous element in the free religious movement. This is the one semblance of argument that runs all through his lecture,—that "Free Religion" exalts reason to the suppression of other faculties; that it "deifies intellect." But will not reason have to be called in after all to adjust these conflicting claims of revelation? How will Mr. Mayo set aside these modern "revelations" that are so dangerous to social order except by applying to them his reason? But he is afraid of reason, for that, too, he thinks is tending rapidly to produce social demoralization. So he is really as much adrift as any of us. For our own part, we see no remedy but the application of enlightened reason, studious of all past experience, conscientiously observant of the laws of Nature, reverent before the great Purpose expressed in those laws and aiming to embody it in human statutes, as a corrective of the individual and the social dangers that lurk in the claim of a specific "revelation."

FALSE CHARITY.

It is the fashion to say handsome things about the older forms of religion which we ourselves have ceased to believe in. Charity is not yet very successful in discovering the good side of "heresy," or "infidelity," or "rationalism," or "humanitarianism;" but it is fully equal to eulogizing Calvinism, Ritualism, and, in particular, Romanism. Its mantle is very wide and very warm over the feet and legs of faith, but thin about the head. It has a splendid sweep backwards. The New York Times poured out vials of wrath on the ministers who held Romanism even indirectly accountable for the bloody riot that disgraced the city last July. The Liberal Christian with less vituperation but as much emphasis rebuked those who charged Romanism with the demoralization of city politics and took pains on its own account to abjure "the vulgar fanaticism which attributes to the Catholic Church evils that were directly traceable to ignorance, inexperience and brutal demagoguism. Even so quick-witted a man as the editor of the Golden Age, in an early number of his paper, drew a fine distinction between Romanism as a political power, and Romanism as a religion, declaring that, while as a political power it was to be resisted, as a religion it was deserving of all respect.

At the risk of being thought uncharitable—the one sin of this sentimental generation—we desire to lay a critical finger on such statements as these and put them where they belong. It is precisely as a Religion that we quarrel with that form of Christianity called Romanism; as a Religion we hold it directly answerable for the ignorance, the stupidity, the moral slavishness, that have made our municipal mismanagement possible, and our political corruption inevitable; it is precisely as a Religion that we hold it responsible for hatreds, bigotries, and violences that for centuries it did more than any thing else to nurture, and now does less than any thing else to repress.

The pretension to temporal power on the part of the Papacy which we so deprecate and dread is but the proper pendant of the equally wild pretension of spiritual power. The acknowledged holder of the spiritual power must be the acknowledged holder of the temporal power also; for the two are logically and practically inseparable. Conscience is implicated in all things, civil, domestic, personal. The interests of family nurture, of domestic discipline, of education public and private, of civil and criminal legislation, of general charity and correction, of reward and punishment are the interests of the soul. Whoever has charge of the soul has charge of these; whoever directs the affairs of the soul directs these, and must direct them; his supremacy is not complete unless he does. Pius IX is no fanatic, but a severe logician. His claim is the natural claim of one who is the spiritual father of society. To distinguish between Romanism as a political power and Romanism as a religion is impossible, for the plain reason that Romanism is, from its nature, a political power. It is essentially and in its first principle a government, and a government co-extensive with the moral concerns of man.

Its chief is a monarch, a lord of lords, a king of kings; he styles himself the vicar of Christ, the vicegerent and representative of the King of heaven and earth. The Romanist is a subject; every Romanist is a subject; and he is held subjected not in his external movements and habits chiefly, but in his interior being. It is in his reason that he is under law; his conscience is under authority; his soul is not his own. The one thing the religion does before any thing else, the one thing it feels called to do, the one thing it must do or surrender its being entirely, is to take care of people, to relieve them of themselves. Its efforts at political domination have been efforts to do this completely, to render its spiritual sway something more than an empty pretension.

This principle is stamped on everything the religion says, does, shows, or possesses. It is built with stone and mortar; it is made solid in its altar forms; it is the soul of its art; every picture and statue conceals it within the marble, behind the canvass. The symbols express it; the emblems suppose it; the very garments of the priests convey its significance. Romanism as a religion teaches the subserviency of human nature to a body of men; inculcates it, institutes it in rite and sacrament, carves it in stone and wood, paints it in glowing colors, puts it into prayers and music, makes poets versify it, makes choirs chant it, makes the very atmosphere of temples breathe it. Without it the faith would be nothing.

Now is it possible to doubt that a religion with a foundation-idea like this involves ignorance, dulness, mental and moral subserviency, a soulless disposition blindly to follow leaders, a tendency to credulity that surrenders people into the power of the demagogue, and makes them tools of men who are restrained by no considerations of truth, or honor, or decency from using them for the basest purposes? Why are the Romanists less instructed as a class, less inquisitive, less independent, less self-asserting, less energetic in social reform than others are? Something, of course, is attributable to race, something to infelicitous circumstances in the old country, though the Church has made itself fairly responsible for such infelicity by its demoralizing theories of life and duty; but the secret of the stupidity and intractableness we complain of must be sought in the religion that puts the soul in charge of a priest. It is the religion that plots the subversion of our popular system of education; it is the religion that supports orphan asylums at the expense of the people for its own sectarian ends; it is the religion that encourages the maintenance in power of men who, whatever else they countenance or discountenance, always countenance the system that commands the most votes. There are individual exceptions no doubt, for the Church has not yet subdued the world, nor quite suppressed the human nature in the hearts of its own members. There are Romanists who are high-minded, independent, honest, loyal, good citizens, noble gentlemen, and they think they owe all their fine qualities to the religion they profess. But so long as the avowed principle of that religion is what it is and always has been, so long must we think them mistaken in their judgment as to the source of their virtue, and must ascribe the qualities of mental courage, moral independence, civic loyalty, and enlightened zeal rather to the radical human nature in them than to the faith that has not availed to quench it. The Romanist who encourages popular education, deprecates the illegal appropriation of public money to his own orphan asylums, commends secular enlightenment, liberally welcomes popular lectures on science and literature, is an anomaly among his brethren. It was with an audible emotion of surprise that we heard of a priest, here and there, who gave his influence to the Reform Party as against the Ring on the occasion of our last election. The action was unexpected; and it was unexpected because the religion is not commonly supposed to foster such independence, and the intimate alliance between the spiritual and temporal powers was a fact too familiar to be explained on the ground of mere coincidence.

They who find fault with Romanism must not forget that it is dangerous first and last as a religion. And it is the more dangerous because it has the fatal charm of antiquity and beauty. If it be fanatical to say this, then we are glad to be counted with a great many good men among the fanatics.

O. B. F.

The Boston Commonwealth turns its opera-glass on our imperfections, reminding us of the little boy who, being asked by his sister what he thought of the new minister, replied—"Oh, he has a big pimple on his nose!" THE INDEX, be it modestly spoken, occasionally contains an idea; but after two years of scrutiny the Commonwealth breaks the silence and quotes—misprints! Is it unreasonable to ask our contemporary to have a soul above pimples?

THE INDEX, of Toledo, has its typographical errors to bear like the rest of us. O. B. Frothingham, describing a radical minister in England, is made to say that he mingles "poetry" with the world. Probably he wrote some such simple word as "freely." And Mr. Potter, of New Bedford, is represented as saying, as if to emphasize the remarkable assertion, that the book of Job is a "form." The reader is relieved by telling him that for "form" he must read "poem."

Mr. Parker Pillsbury gave two eloquent lectures in Toledo recently, with great acceptance. The old fire flashed forth again that once warmed so many hearts to the work of reform. During the winter Mr. Pillsbury is re-engaged as a regular speaker by the Liberal Society in Salem, O., and of course will not be able to lecture in places very distant from that town. He has done admirable work the past summer, and hopes to renew it next year.

Lord Bacon died from rash exposure of his person to cold while stuffing a fowl with snow. His aim was to discover whether snow would stop putrefaction; but in trying to discover one law of Nature, he perished by another. When men fling away character in the pursuit of money, they do the same thing, and earn the epitaph—"Died of a hen."

"Reading the Investigator and THE INDEX always confirms us in our Christian faith." So says the Christian Register. Will it please suggest to its Unitarian readers the propriety of taking stock in the Index Association, as the best way to propagate Christianity?

Mr. A. J. Grover, of Earlville, Ill., has generously donated to the Index Association five hundred copies of his able pamphlet on the Bible aspect of the woman question, which will be advertised next week with other new INDEX Tracts.

EVIL CHURCH INFLUENCES.

MR. EDITOR:—

A writer in THE INDEX of the 11th November, under the signature of "Beza," lately charged upon the churches of this country that they were educating the people in so false and unworthy a belief of God that it would inevitably lead to Atheism, unless Science came to the aid of faith by revealing the true God. But this is not the only damage the Church is doing, although perhaps it is the greatest. There is another count in the indictment which God and Humanity jointly bring against that colossal organization called the Church. It is teaching the most intelligent part of the people to learn and practise the arts of dissimulation and hypocrisy.

The natural tendency of the free institutions of the United States is to make our people not only independent in thought, but frank and open in expressing their opinions; and this feature of character is exhibited whenever they travel abroad. But at home, when by the diffusion of knowledge a man outgrows the creed in which he was educated, he is compelled to cover up the fact from his religious teacher lest that teacher, availing himself of the confidence reposed in him by the community, defame his standing, and thus injure him in his business and reputation. All over the country there are multitudes of men who support the Churches by money, and who occasionally attend the public meetings, but who in their heads reject all the dogmas of the creed, and in their hearts despise all her ceremonies as childish and unmanly. But they are afraid of Church influence, and therefore—"mum's the word." They would like to enjoy their rights as men, and as American citizens, but they don't dare to do so. If in mercantile business, the heresy-hunters, headed by the preacher, would set the people against them, and they would have no custom. If lawyers, they would have no clients. If physicians, no patients. In social life they would lose caste by the charge that there was the taint of scepticism upon them.

It is a terrible fact that in this land there is a large class of influential men whose vocation and bread make it their interest to preserve the old superstitions, and suppress all freedom of inquiry into the truthfulness of their creeds. They hate the light when it illumines the pathway of a man from, instead of to, the Church; and knowing their power with the uneducated, bigoted, and satisfied masses, and knowing too that these masses have patronage which makes the bread and butter of men in business, they drive back to the fold every sheep who shows the least relish for new pastures instead of the old trodden and defiled herbage of the Church. I know many men in the professions and trades, and other callings by which they live, who do not believe a word of the Church creed, but who are sworn members of the organization. They slink around like thieving dogs from one's house to another's, and say in whispers what they ought to proclaim upon the house-tops, and would, if it were not for the preacher and Mrs. Grundy. They "dodge and palter in the shifts of lowness."

Such conduct is very contemptible, to be sure, and the men who practise it know and feel it to be so, or they would not do it. But their business is the means by which they live: and the Devil came very near speaking the truth, when he said—"Yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life." When a man's food and clothing, and those of his wife and children, depend upon the confidence and patronage of the community, these being actual and pressing wants, he truckles, dissimulates, equivocates, and covers up opinions which he feels he has a right to express openly. He suffers the greatest of all losses—the loss of self respect. And this barrier to misconduct thus broken down, he is tempted to go astray in other ways; for the vices are all related, and all flourish in the neighborhood of each other.

Now this deterioration of character the Church is inflicting upon all her intelligent people. The priesthood, instead of encouraging free thought, and kindly parting company with those who honestly change their opinions, force them, by the fear of losing reputation and business, to play the hypocrite, and to seem to be what they are not. Frankness, candor, independence of thought and speech, which are among the noblest attributes of character, are suppressed, and dissimulation, craven-heartedness, and all the rest of the hateful brood, are encouraged into growth. It was a terrible charge, yet true, that was made against the system of Slavery, that it forced its victims to become thieves and liars. The Church is guilty of a similar outrage in forcing her intelligent people to practise the base arts of hypocrisy. Professing to save souls, she is training them to such faulty characters as will compel them, when they cross the silent river, to tarry long as dwellers upon the threshold, to unlearn their education before they can begin their ascent on the plane of progress and happiness.

PHILO-BEZA.

"TWO WONDER-BOOKS TO SWEEP THE COBWEBS OUT OF THE SKY."

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:

About six weeks ago, a modest inquirer asked, in your columns, where to look for theological knowledge, and I have been surprised that no one of your able contributors has answered a demand so interesting. It seems therefore, oddly enough, to be my duty to say that the book, of all others, that has seemed nearest to a revelation to me is Miss Martineau's "Eastern Life," a work which would probably have made a profound sensation in the literary world if it had not been published some thirty years ago, before that world was ripe for its reception. It contains a charming account of the author's travels, in company with some highly cultivated friends, in Egypt and Palestine, with a most instructive essay on the life and purposes of Moses and his dealings with the Israelites of old; and a wonderful history of ancient Egypt. I took pains, about a year ago, to attend a course of lectures upon Egypt by Dr. Thompson, of New York, and was astonished to find how little that able man, who is said to have made the subject the chief study of his life, had to add to the knowledge imparted by Miss Martineau.

One striking statement of hers is that Moses, who was versed in all the learning of the Egyptians, intended to impart the results of that learning to his countrymen, and to teach them that there was but one God and that they who worship Him should do so in spirit, without priest or mediator—without ritual or ceremonial; but that the people were too ignorant to appreciate his plans, and he was compelled so far to defer to their weakness as from time to time to gratify them with some new ceremony, observance, or institution.

One cannot read this book without feeling that the wisest and most learned men who lived five thousand years ago were about as wise and nearly as well-instructed as the most advanced of the present time; and while the art of printing has made knowledge vastly more common, yet the knowledge possessed by the race has not so far increased as to warrant much exultation.

An Egyptian priest would probably have enjoyed the society of Mr. Darwin, and Aristotle and Huxley would have been delighted with each other and would have differed very little on questions of theology. Indeed the four, if brought together by some magical process, would doubtless agree that nothing can be more absurd for a finite being than to attempt to define the Infinite—or confidently to give attributes to what is "beyond the reaches of our souls."

It is my disagreeable duty to add that this "Eastern Life" is out of print, and that a bibliopolist of my acquaintance who coveted it had to send to London and buy it at Robert Mudie's great circulating library. There are copies in several libraries in this country, however, and perhaps you may have in Toledo a publisher enterprising enough to issue a new edition.

There is another work written at about the same time which connects itself intimately with the above, and with it constitutes my small (but great) theological library, owned, however, in printed form by others and not by me. That is Mr. Francis Newman's "History of the Hebrew Monarchy," a work of great erudition and obviously of immense and ably directed labor, although physically of small compass. It clears up the Biblical accounts of the Hebrews and their polity, brings together those portions of the different books in what is called the Old Testament which belong together chronologically or otherwise, and for me at least brings order out of chaos in a measure for which I cannot be too grateful to the learned and admired author. One remark of his is obviously true, but it was quite new to me. It is that the Hebrew prophecies were orally delivered before they were written. He says that Isaiah was like a modern Santon, and that, when he was to go and prophesy to the King, he wounded himself and threw dirt over his person, and rent his garments, and then performed his office; and afterwards certainly,—how long afterwards we do not know,—he (or some one else) committed his words to writing.

I was pleased once to hear a young lady say—"My favorite books are Gibbon and Milton, Mr. Newman and Miss Martineau." The only works she had read of the two latter were those I have mentioned. I thought her mind must be well cleared of cant. The spirit of each of these two books is noble and lovely. After reading these, one is in condition to enjoy the admirable writings of Miss Frances Power Cobbe.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
J. VILA BLAKE, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.

Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Send $2.00 for one year, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 8) will be sent postpaid on receipt of fifty cents. These include "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. Abbot; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B. Bradford; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. O. B. Frothingham, and other equally valuable Tracts.

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

THE FUTURE OF GERMANISM IN AMERICA.

[A Discourse Delivered by C. Reemelin, January 3, 1871, before the German Pioneer Society, Cincinnati.]

The history of the country teaches us that, as the Phœnicians and other nations of antiquity ever believed, when they established colonies, that they were erecting a new Tyre, Messina or Troja; so imagine modern people that they institute renewals of their old homes in America. The names New Spain, New England and Nova Scotia, as well as those of many of our cities, towns and villages, attest how wide-spread this assurance is among men, and we need not wonder that it also animates the Germans in their American settlements, and that a Germany reconstructed in America is a favorite fancy with most German emigrants.

On closer examination, however, of this popular spirit of propagation, which is but the love of individuals for offspring nationalized, we discover an inconsistency in the conduct of those settlers. They leave their home because dissatisfied with them for some reason, and go into a new country to better their condition; but they seek, the moment they arrive, to rebuild their former home. This evinces a double tendency in their behavior, namely; in the emigrant, flight from the old that chained him and a desire for the new that is to liberate him,—but soon comes the reaction in the immigrant, for he recoils from the transformation which the new country thrusts upon him, and he falls back upon his home nature. He now wants to remain what he was; the habitual and the known is dearer to him than the unusual and unknown. He regards the force of the new natural relations as if, as to him, they were illegalities which he should not obey. The German who comes into the United States finds himself surrounded by a people strange to him; and its social rules meet him as orders and laws in whose making neither he nor his people had a voice, and they appear to him as coercions which he must resist. What increases the bewilderment of the German immigrant is the presence of other immigrants, to whom a part of the transformation asked of him is spared, since their native usages and language prevail largely in the new country, which he, of course, dislikes. A native jealousy now mingles with his other aversions to the new nature that oppresses him, and he retires into his German self and cultivates it as his dearest object.

We find in "Cosmos," a book which we will have to cite frequently, the following remarkable words:—

"The mind pursues the self-chosen objects under the most varied physical influences; it ever strives to be free of the earth-force; but the enfranchisement is never entirely complete. Something still remains of that which belongs to the natural aptitudes which arise out of ancestry, climate, a clear blue sky of the home land, the murky atmosphere of an insular country."

The solution of the question as to the future of Germanism in America seems to me to lie in the comprehension of this extract, for it invites us to compare our fate with that of others, and to bear in mind that, as the Europeans were mostly West Asiatic immigrants, and as they underwent a gradual but never-ceasing obliteration of that which they brought from Asia, so will there be also a transformation here in which much of the old will remain but subordinate to the new natural conditions.

It may be well, however, to come to an understanding among ourselves as to what we mean by the Germanism which we want to preserve. Is it the daily social conference with beer-drinking? Or the regular imbibing of Rhine wine? Is it German cooking at our domestic hearthstone? Is it wine culture or some other branch of horticulture? Or does it consist, as was long supposed, in cultivating the deeper religiosities, which we claim for ourselves in churches where they preach in German? Or does Germanism anchor in German newspapers, or their staff the German stump-speakers? Or must we look for it especially to our German-singing societies, or the Turners, or the labor unions? Is it the official recognition of the German language in the printing of public documents or in school instruction? Or will you say to me that, better than all this, it rests in the home-economy of German women and the integrity of German men? Or will you bid me to rise higher yet and to seek for it in German literature? Or if no one point of all these satisfy you, will you put them all together and comprise them all in one word as Germanism? And this seems very probable, and if we accept them as such, it would seem that the kernel of the whole of it is the German language, for it is, as Humboldt says so correctly, "a part of the cognition of the natural spirit, and this spirit's tenderest bloom." We have arrived therefore precisely where the poet came to, when he asked—"Where is the German fatherland?" Namely, we find Germanism in the German tongue, but not in its verbal sounds, but the spirit which is embodied in it; for "language is," again employing Humboldt's ideas, "bodily aptitudes with mental capacities."

And having reached this understanding, the eye of our conceptions is wafted over into our home, and we seek and find there the bodily aptitudes and the mental capacities which made the German language and all Germanisms. There, says an inner voice to us, is the root of its Past; there grows its Present; there blooms most securely its Future; there surely also, it is to blossom. And thus arises the query—Is there something in a people which it can carry, without detriment to itself and to other nations, beyond its natural boundaries? And if, with the literary sway exercised by the Greeks, the Romans, and the Israelites over other nations in view, we answer "yes," then arises the further question: What is that something in the German character?

I have had the good fortune to come in contact with German folks in more countries, and under more varied relations, than is vouchsafed to one man in a hundred thousand. I associated with them not only in Germany proper, but also in Switzerland, and with all classes of the people. But also outside of Germany, in the Baltic provinces, Hungary, Northern Italy, France, Denmark, England, and of course this, my new home (America), have I mingled with Germans. Residing here for forty years, I have enjoyed the happiness to return four times to my native land, and there I compared what I saw abroad with things in Germany itself. I do not state this by way of boast, but I desire to widen the circle of your thoughts as well as mine, and to bring before us the fact that Germanisms are struggling for recognition, not only here, but also in and around Germany. Yea, it extends beyond the countries I have visited, as I learn from books of travel, especially, for instance, on the Lower Danube.

And what do we find in this enlarged field of Germanic strength? We see in Germany itself folks who speak and understand only German. Of them we can say, with perfect propriety, their Germanism is very small! Then we meet there, also, men and women who converse and comprehend more languages than their mother tongue; and how much wider is their horizon! How much wider is their fatherland! Then there are, outside of Germany, German rambles who hastily surrender cheaply their German tongue and acquire another. Their Germanism was not much, and they lose it quickly. Alongside of them live Germans who have added to their native language others without losing their own, especially that of the country they migrated into, and they have increased their Germanism and they know why and wherein it exists.

Everywhere, however, there exist also persons who, though not of German origin, yet speak, yea, what is more, cultivate the German language, and they do it with an assiduity which shames many of us. I refer to men like Ectvoes in Hungary, Schuselka in Vienna, Boussingault in Alsace, Carlyle in England, and Longfellow in America. There is therefore a liberal Germanism in Germany, that looks far beyond the political frontiers of Germany, and is fair to other nations; but there is a German culture, which is indeed the child of the other, that looks in upon old fatherland. Germany is accordingly an adoptive mother, and she has also adopted children as well as America, only in another way. She has, for instance, as such, the Jews, verily not despicable train-bearers of German culture, and she has them in Hungary, Transylvania, North Italy, France, England, and especially in America; adherents of whom we may speak as being countless as the sands of the sea, who are willing to be German and can be such, if we will only allow them to be it cosmopolitically, but all of whom will and must hate the German if it is forced upon them by the corporal's cane.

Alongside of the cosmopolitic Germanism, we are often—too often—confronted by a locked up and excluding Germanism. Such Germans are, when in Germany, folks who accept those only as German bees who get their honey in German gardens, and who, when outside of Germany, hold that Germanism consists in spinning themselves into some small German settlement, that has the least possible intercourse with other folks. They act much like persons who, because they migrated in children's clothes, cut all their garments subsequently by an infantile pattern. I found such Germans in Hungary, and was told that there were masses of them in Transylvania. There are such in this country. They are crystallized remains of an antiquated German civilization, and most of them use, as a means of guarding their stolidities, some religious organism, as for instance, certain Lutherans did in Georgia, and Rapp's colony did on Ohio, and as Zorite followers of Bauember did in Tuscarawas, in this State. They got their ideas from the Old Testament; they simply substituted for Palestine, Germany, and for Hebrew, the German language. They were obstructing progress in Germany, and they are so here.

Need I say that such Germanism is contrary to the entire better development in Germany itself? Germany has not only flooded other peoples and transformed them in a large degree, but it has also changed manifoldly its own population, and taken up much from other nations. The religions and jurisprudence of Germany attest this in its history, and the modern rapid spread of factories and workshops, after English and French models, prove it in our days. Surely it is not very long since that thing which we call Germanism, and of which we are justly proud, began with men like Goethe, Schiller, Kant, Thaer, the Humboldt brothers, and Hardenberg and Stein, and attained its highest point under the guidance of the great cosmopolite supporters of present German civilization.

The German people carried their blood beyond the Karpati, and deep down to the Lower Danube; they transmitted it beyond the Alps and the Rhine, but they carried back also much that was foreign, and then elaborated it into a sort of German nature. Is it not plain, then, that he only is capable of deciding what is good in Germanism who examines calmly how it amplified itself in our day? Let us confess unreservedly that it has been stimulated and influenced largely from abroad, but let us also contend that it could only in Germany become what it is. That native land of ours was the soil of its growth; it must be the hearthstone of its future! Understanding this, we will comprehend why Germany, that was a century ago behind other nations, excels them now, yea, has become their teacher. This was not done by that part of our people who buttoned themselves up, but it was effected by the open-minded, those that had eyes and ears for the good and beautiful, wherever it may have developed. The greatest work of our country, yea, we have a right to say, of our age, Humboldt's "Cosmos," will convey the knowledge hereof most honestly to posterity. It is as great as it is because the sage who wrote it gathered information, like a busy bee, from all points—was just to the thinkers of other nations, and allowed nature and human knowledge to reflect itself in him; then he elaborated it into his German work. The loftiest Germans, such as Goethe, for instance, remained strangers to a Germanism that would belittle them and their country. And as it was with the literary men, so it was in all other things. The German manufacturers, the German higher mechanics, the enlarged mercantile spirit of our day, and steamboats, railroads and telegraphs became indigenous in Germany, because Germany opened itself up. It is indeed true that in the fatherland there are commingled all the forces and capacities that were necessary to give them the character which now surprises us by its naturalized vigor. Who does not perceive that a people that want to win a world must have a world in them? In our language we call philosophy "world-wisdom," and when we wish to designate a cultivated man we say: "He has world." This world-mind has always created the best Germanism. It did it in the Hansa, and then again in Goethe, Kant, Fichte the Humboldts, and in our age Liebig, Schultze-Delesch, Gneist and Fischer, the æsthetician, but also in her universities, her factories, merchants' counting rooms, and her workshops and fields and gardens.

German universities are what they are because, through wisdom imbibed from other nations, the public sentiment there requires that every officer of Government, every physician, every jurist, every teacher, yea, all who wish to move in higher circles, must have a university education.

German steamer lines are what they are because, though the vessels are built in Scotland, the merchants and officers who control them are highly cultivated gentlemen. German railroads are as good and safe as they are, because such things are in Germany confided only to men of technical capacities. And German factories, like that of Krupp, at Essen, charm our eyes, because the owners have excellent qualities as directors, and the workmen are industrious and accurate in their work, and not as assuming as English and American operatives are.

There is, then, something in the German people which it, or we, its children, may, without detriment to itself, and without injury to the "free inner development" of other nations, spread over the entire world, and seek to give it efficacy and permanence. This something is that spirit in our countrymen, for which they are liked in foreign lands, and for which Eastern Russia, as well as Western America, likes to see us.

Goethe speaks upon this subject as follows:—

"Every nation has peculiarities by which it is distinguished from others, and they constitute points through which nations diverge from each other, and feel themselves either repelled or attracted. The exteriors of these special peculiarities appear to others strange, frequently offensive, and often ridiculous. They are the cause why we always esteem a nation less than it deserves. The interiorities thereof are never known, nor were taken cognizance of by outside populations, nor hardly by the people themselves. These interiorities develop in a whole nation, as they do in a single person, namely, unconsciously. We wonder, we are astonished by that which eventually exhibits itself."

Who does not, on reading this, see that America cannot be the hearthstone where European peculiarities are cooked up or kept warm as the victuals for all its people? We Germans see quickly how absurd it is to make America into a second edition of Anglo-Saxonism or Celtism. We laugh among ourselves when we hear such idealities, for we know that there are too many Germans here to continue this nonsense. But is it not exactly so with Germanism in America? This country is no kitchen, where a pot is placed upon the fire for every European people, wherein it may cook its broth or cabbage. It is a great country that acts powerfully upon its inhabitants, and whose climate and other natural conditions must transform every immigrant. These do indeed bring with them certain bodily aptitudes and mental forces which they will partly propagate, but the great long future is determined by America. We may ask of its people that they shall keep open house, open minds for the reception of everything that is useful from abroad; but that they should allow themselves to be put into an English, French or German straight-jacket, that is asking too much, and ever impracticable. It, the country itself, with its climate, its giant rivers and mountains and its quodlibet of a population, it is the wide straight-jacket, into which we all will have to find ourselves.

That Germany is the source and laboratory of all specific Germanism does not, however, preclude the desire that America may take up its better parts and use them with the other causes from which its "interiorities" are hereafter to be developed. Germanism may in the old country be shoved a degree eastward, southward or westward, but the farther from the centre, the more likely will it become dimmer, and disappear. The reason is that near the frontiers national characteristics become blended and cease to be distinguishable. They remain in an active interchange with the educational institutions in Germany, as well as its other means of culture; that seems to me the only way to maintain any Germanalities here that deserve to be adopted and sustained.

The dissemination of German books and journals—attending German universities, receiving instruction there in the arts and technical sciences—the incessant introduction here of persons and things that excel in certain matters, which means the continuance of immigration and the social influences it carries with it, the learning of German in the schools, and the use of our knowledge of two languages for the purpose of disseminating in America the treasures of German research, these are the ways and means to give America that from Germany which will be beneficial to our new home.

Many resident Germans flatter themselves that they help to sustain Germanism here, but this is a misconception in them. They do so in a very limited degree; that is to say, they carry with them their home-life, as the so-called Saxons did in Transylvania, as the so-called Suabians did in Hungary, and as the Danes did into Iceland, to-wit: they preserve their native habits, as they were, when they left. Such stolidities do not satisfy us, nor anybody, as I hope. Who is not glad that Bethlehem, in Pennsylvania, for instance, has not remained what German piety meant it to be—an odd, separate thing in the great household of America? Fortunately it could not withdraw itself from the "earth force," which acted upon it like gravitation, and which gave back to human society the American Herrenhuters.

America wants no schools in which either Germans or English folks, or their descendants, have the say alone. We must come out of that shell, and agree that whatever is good and useful in Germanism shall prove itself to be such in the struggles out of which will ensue, in after times, the manners and customs which then shall be properly called American. We are now, one and all of us, in transitory conditions. Every day German influence is increasing, not only through a larger number of heads, but also through modifications in the social life of this people, but more especially, and more excellently, by higher directions of the intelligence of America, as it becomes more and more acquainted with the present higher knowledge of Germany, trans-Atlantic Germany if you please, the one from which we German Americans also improve.

Humboldt, Uhland, Zschokke, Goethe, Schiller, Kant and Hegel have each one of them done more for the future of Germanism in America than all the Germans that have existed in it. This single fact should teach us what relations are proper for us in reference to all Germanism. It is the affectionate inquiry within ourselves whether, in a given case, we shall recommend them as examples proper to be followed by the land of our adoption.

Germany has not always presented to the world a Germanism that deserved to be followed. Not a whole year has passed away, since one phase of German excellence, and verily, not the best, has struck the attention of our eyes. But five years ago those preached in the wilderness (I was one of them) who directed the eyes of mankind to certain German superiorities. Now when they stand in the zenith of their strength—everybody sees them. And as we dared then to compare Germany with over-estimated America, so we will now have the courage to ask: "Will Germany always be in the zenith?" The world's history instructs us that individuals and people do not remain on the summit forever, and it would, therefore, in our opinion, be wrong to make any one nation our special model, because it has now reached its pinnacle, or to interlock the fate of this people with that of any other. America repelled England when it proposed to treat this country forever as its child! Why should it not do likewise to similar efforts on the part of Germany?

"All men are," says Humboldt, "equally destined to liberty—to liberty such as in raw conditions belongs to single individuals, but which, in the life of States that enjoy political institutions, are the right of its total organism."

This right of America to develop out of itself its nature and its people, to which we, of course, also belong, this right we must not attempt to abridge; on the contrary, it should be our motto that not only from England, but from Germany also, let America be free.

But liberty does not mean seclusion from other peoples, and still less does it countenance a preference for one immigrant nation over another, and designating it as "the mother country." There was a time when English institutions deserved preference, and there was a period when England gave laws to the world. Then it looked as if its language was not only the bearer of the finest and highest intelligence, but that it would remain so. But those times are passed. England has ceased to have the best in any branch of human culture. More and more weaknesses show themselves, which the splendor of its power concealed formerly from the eye of mankind. Anglicanism was never the only source of the Better in America, and it is so now less than ever. England is behind in too many things now to assist this country in the development as well as Germany can. The long-existing injustice of slighting German culture in this country must stop, and the equality of European peculiarities must be recognized. The old preference of Angloism offended us, but a preference for Germanism would also offend the other elements of our population. Do not let us try to effectuate such a thing! It would be neither useful to America, nor to us. All portions of this mixed people need liberty, so as to be able to develop naturally and healthily.

According to my opinion, we may find at the close of the first volume of "Cosmos," the correct conception of the relations of peoples to each other, especially of such as have, like us, been wanderers from our native homes. He says:—

"The child yearns to go beyond the hills and the lakes which surround its narrow home, but it yearns afterwards also, plant-like, to return; for it is an affecting and beautiful trait in man, that yearning for that which he desires, or that which he has lost, keeps him from remaining fixed in the moment. Thus, rooted in the inner nature of man, and more-over demanded by his highest aims and efforts, a benign humane communion of the whole species becomes one of the great leading ideas in the history of mankind."

This idea of a world-citizenship, resting as it does on an open mind for all that is good in every nation, is the kernel of the meritorious in Germanism. To it I wish from all my heart, both in the new and old world, a happy future. What classical antiquity, the better Hellenic and Romanic world, and what the higher Israelitism was and is for mankind, that, only in a still higher sense, let Germanism, as it developed itself in our age, be to the coming generations, and especially to America.—Commoner.

AUDI ALTERAM PARTEM.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Your paper has a world-wide and enviable reputation for candor and fair-play. Its liberality to opponents is marvellous, and shames the narrow one-sidedness of the religious press generally, proving that its editor seeks the truth above all things else, and feels that he has nothing to fear from it.

Having for thirty years been an Attorney-at-Law and by the Gospel for four millions of dumb and defenceless black Americans, now that they do not need my humble services any longer I naturally and voluntarily sustain a similar relation to four hundred millions of Chinese, whose government has been condemned, especially in this country, without a hearing. Let me state the case.

A year ago last June the civilized world was thrown into a state of consternation by the massacre of the French missionaries at Tien-tsin in China. In a little while the procedure was magnified into a design on the part of the Chinese to drive out of their country all the foreign residents—merchants and missionaries. So stupid was the amazement that no one took time to notice the fact, and make the proper inference from it, that the vengeance of the Chinese was wreaked only on the French Catholic Missionaries. The Methodists were not molested. Dr. Martin, a Presbyterian, and the President of the Pekin University, retained the confidence and respect of the Chinese officials at the seat of government. The wrath of the Tien-tsin people discriminated against the French, and in favor of all the rest of the missionaries.

Now there was a reason for all this. Although France had less trade with China than many of the smaller governments of Europe that were not in the category of the "Treaty Powers," one would judge from the magnificence of her diplomatic and consular service, and the singular authority assumed by her missionaries, that she stood at the head instead of the tail of the trading nations. Mr. Bonaparte, the late Emperor, understood well the game of brag and prestige; and he understood also what Americans call "buncombe," and practised them both on a grand scale. The French built an Orphan Asylum at Tien-tsin, and surrounded it with high walls; and having plenty of silver, the Chinese, seeing many little coffins going out of the enclosure every month, suspected that the eyes of those children were scooped out to be used for metallurgical purposes. Foolish as the idea is to us, the Chinese believed that a larger proportion of silver could be taken from the ore by this method than by any other. Hence their suspicion concerning the Orphan Asylum, and hence also the massacre of the missionaries, which was a crime, not to be excused, but only extenuated.

The accompanying document, entitled "A Despatch concerning Missionaries," issued from the Tsung-li-Yamen some months ago, and containing Rules to be observed, with Notes appended, will show that the Chinese have a clear case against the French. These missionaries, with an arrogance that no people on earth would tolerate as long as the Chinese did, undertook to assume civil and municipal powers, giving names to streets in the city, and lording it over the local government, as if China were a mere appendage to the Roman See. If Catholic propagandists should take such liberties in England, or Holland, or in any part of the United States except the city of New York, they would be hustled out of the country in short metre. But the whole world seemed to think that China should be victimized to popish pride and insolence without complaint.

Now, as THE INDEX circulates all over the nation, I send to your office the Despatch alluded to for publication, hoping that my countrymen by this means will get at least a glimpse of the facts in the case, and be generous enough to stand by the Chinese in their efforts to defend their autonomy against the impudent and arrogant presumptions of these French ecclesiastics. They believe in the divine right of the Papacy and of the temporal power, and are a dangerous class in any country. We see from the way their confreres, the Irish Catholics, act in New York, where they have the power, what the minions of the Pope would do everywhere in our country if they dared—make the civil subject to the ecclesiastical authority. I am sorry to say that one American missionary, in his zeal without knowledge, undertook to play the French game with the Chinese on a small scale, but was ordered back by our representatives there to the treaty ports, and directed to confine his labors within treaty bounds.

Mr. Editor, many people in this country regard the Chinese as Pagans very low down in the scale both of knowledge and virtue. There never was a greater mistake. They were a thousand years ago ahead of us in their ideas of the dignity and efficiency of the civil service. By their competitive examinations of all candidates for office, without regard either to birth or religion, they secure the best talent and education the country affords. Was there ever issued from Washington, London, or Paris, a more compact and finished document than the one I send you? It is of a piece with all their state papers. They do not, like the Americans; put uneducated, immoral, vulgar, and unfit persons into official stations; but from the highest to the lowest, every man who bears rule understands and performs the duties of his post.

Some say they are "heathen." Just read the correspondence between the Chinese Commissioner and the British authorities at the time the English began the opium war. Why, you would say, if you were not informed otherwise, that the Chinaman was the Christian and the Englishman was the Pagan! The earnest pleadings and protestations of the Chinese Commissioner against forcing the deadly drug upon his countrymen would fire your eye, and redden your cheek with shame and indignation, at the cold, unprincipled character of English cupidity. Yet Gutzlaff, the Christian missionary, sold his knowledge of the Chinese language for gold to the British opium merchant, and instead of saving souls accompanied the opium ships in their smuggling excursions along the coast as interpreter, and thus helped to fasten upon these innocent people a habit of opium-smoking, which, according to his creed, has filled hell with thousands of victims. I have seen in one of the treaty ports the hulk of a ship in which Gutzlaff sailed in his death-dealing errand among the "heathen Chinese;" and Dr. Wells Williams, the Interpreter long connected with our Legation at Peking, in his work entitled "The Middle Kingdom," is my authority for the fact concerning Gutzlaff, whose praise was in all the churches of the United States thirty years ago. From all the Chinese have seen and experienced of the meddlesome, avaricious, encroaching, and immoral policy of the so-called Christian and Protestant nations, it is no wonder that they entreat us to leave them alone in the enjoyment of their own religion. Neither Confucianism nor Buddhism ever projected two such outrages as the opium trade and the coolie trade, by which mainly China has been made acquainted with the character of Christian nations.

Respectfully yours,

A. B. BRADFORD.

ENON VALLEY, Pa., 25 Nov., 1871.

[From the Shanghai News-Letter.]

RULE I.—The orphan asylums heretofore established in China have never been reported to the authorities, and the secret things done in them have caused much suspicion; if they cannot be all closed, which would be the best way, then let the children of converts only be taken in, and their number, ages and time of acceptance, and whether any one afterward adopts them, be all reported to the officials; it is not necessary for the children of others to be admitted into these institutions.

Note.—It is the custom in China for these various particulars to be reported to the magistrates in relation to native asylums, where the parents of the children can go and see them, and learn their condition, and if any one wishes to adopt a child, or parents to take their own home again, both can be done. These regulations, we are informed, are enforced in western countries, where these asylums are open to examination; but in China alone, when once a child is put into these asylums, it can never be visited by its parents; they cannot get it back nor can anybody else adopt it. Such a mode gives rise to grave suspicions, and though it has been proved that nothing like gouging eyes or cutting out hearts is practised, yet, owing to this secret mode of managing them, the people still harbor suspicion. If the object and management of these asylums are all good, let the efforts be confined to their own converts, and let the Chinese people manage their own orphans, and thus no differences will arise as to the manner of doing this good.

RULE II.—Chinese women should not be permitted to go into churches, nor should sisters of charity (lit. female scholars) act as missionaries; this will be more creditable to the character of the sect.

Note.—The separation of the sexes in China is carefully guarded, and when it is reported abroad that men and women assemble together in the churches, outside people have their suspicions aroused, and for the credit of the sect this ought to be changed.

RULE III.—Missionaries living in China should conform to its customs, and not set themselves up as independent, encroaching on the functions of its rulers, or interfering in the execution of the laws; nor should they vilify the doctrines of the sages; if they do these things, they ought to be amenable to the local officials. Native converts are now excused from joining in or contributing to idolatrous festivals, but they cannot be excused from paying taxes, or doing public work, or contributing to the exigencies of government; nor can foreign missionaries protect them in resisting these calls and obligations, nor interfere when they come into the native courts, nor secrete parties in legal cases, thereby preventing any decision. If they act in this illegal manner, let them be deported. Those converts who trust to such aid to carry their ends shall be more severely punished.

Note.—In China, Buddhists, Lamas, Taoists, and the Confucianists all conform to the laws, and we have learned that the Romish missionaries do so in other countries, and are not permitted to act in this independent manner, and in those lands arrogate power or encroach on the functions of the rulers. Their proceedings in Szechuen and Kweichow provinces bring great odium upon their sect, and destroy all authority. These men interfere in marriages and break betrothals when one of the parties becomes a convert; and if some members of a family join their number, they report the others as contumacious and making trouble. These and other causes of irritation are producing deep resentment in those regions against all Roman Catholics.

RULE IV.—It is necessary when natives and foreigners live together in China, for each party to be governed by their own laws, and criminals to be punished according to their respective sentences. Missionaries are therefore not to conceal native offenders, or involve the innocent, and when they themselves do wrong they should be punished. No indemnity should be afterwards demanded because a man has been punished; and all missionaries who interfere in legal cases, either to screen their converts, or hide criminals, or in any other way to take up cases, should be deported.

Note.—One case in Szechuen, where the sum of 80,000 taels was demanded for the death of M. MABILLAT in 1865, to be paid by the gentry, caused much indignation; but when in the same province another missionary was killed in a mob in 1867, the murderers were punished by the provincial officers. On the other hand, when the native Romanists, headed by a native priest, killed and injured more than two hundred people, the missionary declared that the leader had fled beyond sea and could not be traced out.

RULE V.—When French missionaries obtain passports to go to any place in the interior, they should report their arrival to the officers; a passport should not be used by another person, nor transferred to a native, nor kept when the missionary leaves the country or changes his profession. The name given in Chinese should be identified with the foreigner, and no passport should be given for him to go to those regions where military operations are carried on.

Note.—Cases of false names being put into passports; and where native priests have screened themselves under foreign passports; and where persons leaving the mission have not returned their passports, are quoted; all such doings tend to throw discredit upon the passport, and reproach on the Government which issues it, and lessen the power of His Majesty who guarantees it.

RULE VI.—Great care should be taken by missionaries as to the character of the converts, whether they have been convicted of crime or not. The number, names, and times of admission should be reported to the officials, as is done when persons become priests, giving the occupation of the convert, where he came from, and other particulars. If he is afterwards convicted of crime, he should be excommunicated; and quarterly or monthly returns made to the magistrates as is done by the Rationalists and Buddhists for their converts, nunneries and temples.

Note.—It is well known that in Kweichow province, several rebels entered the Roman Catholic sect, who banded together to excite disturbances, killing and wounding people; and several others assumed great titles and authority, oppressing the feeble, and entering the public offices in a boisterous manner to intimidate and browbeat the authorities, producing the cards of the foreign missionaries as they demanded the release of the native converts.

RULE VII.—Missionaries living in China are not to use official seals, or write official despatches to the native authorities, nor overpass their proper functions; they are to address the local authorities by petition as native scholars do, and when they wish to see them personally, treat them with the same courtesy; nor are they to rudely enter the courts to disturb the public business.

Note.—Several instances of French missionaries having offended in one or other of these particulars against the etiquette of Chinese society are given, one of whom sent a dispatch to the Foreign Office by the Government post commending a native officer; another had an official seal cast; another styled himself a siun-fu or provincial governor; and a fourth asked that certain magistrates in Kweichow and Szechuen should be degraded,—all of which proceedings derogate from the authority of the Emperor and his officers in their own land.

RULE VIII.—No missionary shall hereafter be allowed to claim any place as having once belonged to the Roman Catholic church; and when a piece of land is bought to erect one, or a house is to be rented, the owner shall report the matter to the officers, and, if no objection of any kind is brought forward, it can be obtained, and thus no ill-will will be caused. The deed for such place shall always be made out in the name of the church (as has already been agreed upon with the French Minister), and that it is public property, and that no one shall simulate names and falsify deeds in order to procure them.

Note.—The unhappy consequences of the resumption of the property claimed to have once belonged to the Roman Catholics in various parts of China are many and serious. The old buildings were destroyed in many cases and the evidences of original ownership by the Church were imperfect or disputable; which opened out the opportunity for demanding that elegant houses, or public buildings, or places held in great consideration, should be given up to them, without any compensation for the outlay, or regard for the changes in ownership that had transpired, or thought to the public feelings of the community. If the original buildings had fallen into ruin, they demanded that repairs be made by the people. All these things having excited great indignation against the Romanists in all parts of China, therefore no more claims are to be made for property formerly said to have been owned by them.

A STRANGE RELIGION.—Rev. Dr. Blake, in his "Notes on America," now appearing in the Sunday Magazine, relates the following anecdote illustrative of a certain phase of negro piety:—

"A lady was convinced that her cook had stolen a goose. The woman stoutly and angrily denied it. Though morally certain of it, the lady thought it best to wait for a fit opportunity to get a confession. On the following Sunday morning the cook asked leave to go out for the day that she might attend 'the munion.' Her mistress was quite willing that she should go out, but wondered at her thinking of going to the communion. 'You know, Sally, you took that goose; how can you think of going to the munion?' 'Well, missus,' said Sally, 'if you will have it, I did take the goose; but if you suppose that for the matter of one goose I am going to renounce my Lord and Saviour, you're very much mistaken.'"

Mr. Miles then vividly portrayed the horrors of war, referring especially to the Franco-Prussian war, and quoting the words of Father Hyacinthe, who says, "I have seen more frightful spectacles than any upon the battle field." What had he seen? "I have seen French mothers hugging their babes to their bosoms and in the transports of their patriotism telling them, in tones to make one shudder, 'Child, hate the Prussians! Hate the Prussians!' And he says to Germany, 'Beware! What a neighbor are you nursing, and preparing to live by your side in the future?' O, the terribleness, the enormity of that evil which will convert the pure and divine love of woman, the divinest, sweetest thing known on earth, into such a quintessence of hatred!—Advocate of Peace.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"You doubtless saw the enclosed from Zion's Herald at the time it was published. As you may not, I clip and send it—it is fresh. My friend Haven, while very much attached to ancient orthodox modes of expression, especially for so radical, bold and vigorous a reformer, is yet one of the most genial and generous of men. There isn't a bigoted or an illiberal hair in his head. Not always wise, he is always hearty, correct and honest in his methods, and his columns will never be found disgraced by any such specimens of intolerably bad taste as that recently quoted by you from the Milwaukee Index, and to which you fitly responded."

"It is a little trying, as you may suppose, after a half-century of effort to make Christianity mean purely what is moral and spiritual, and when that had come to be the only sense, I may say, in which the word was used in literature, to have it assumed to be a cast-iron symbol of dogmatic orthodoxy, and in that shape pitched into and repudiated. However, every man knows his own business best, and if that is what it means 'out West,' I see nothing for it but for you to go ahead. The response you get in your column of correspondence is a very interesting and remarkable feature in your paper. I generally read that first of all."

"Although of rather an atheistic turn of mind, still I am confident your noble effort will reach a larger and more influential class of thinkers than if it had a more materialistic direction. I agree with you that it is wiser to wait until science draws aside the veil, than to dogmatize upon what we are ignorant of. Truly it may be said—'What can we reason from, but what we know?' Wishing you success, I remain respectfully, &c."

"There is vitality and power in THE LITTLE INDEX that will endure. Don't enlarge it—quality, not quantity, is the motto. Condense yourself and all the rest into it every week, and the product will be a popular jewel for which you may demand and receive almost any price, wherever there are men and women emancipated from the bondage of spiritual superstition and the pauperism of religious cant and mummery."

"And though it contains, here and there, editorials or communications with which I do not agree; yet these have almost as much interest for me—sometimes even more—than those in which you or they speak my own mind. For it is such especially that awaken thought,—as the generosity and liberality with which you allow all opinions free expression, grant all subjects a discussion, makes the paper the more spicy."

"I cannot help feeling that you have received from our Puritan forefathers something of their narrowness as well as their fidelity. You do not appear to be able to do justice to Jesus or to many who wish to be known as his disciples. Each in his own place, however—each one to do his work in his own way. God will use us all."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society will be held for the present on Sunday mornings, at 10½ o'clock, in WALBRIDGE HALL, No. 160, Summit Street. The public are cordially invited to attend.

WILBURN FUND.—Miss Cora Wilburn acknowledges with thanks the receipt of $10.00 from Mrs. C. W. Welch, Cambridge, Mass. She states that she has moved into her new home, having paid $200.00, and having $125.00 to pay within the next four months, for which she depends on voluntary contributions. The above acknowledgement has been delayed in consequence of moving.

SOCIAL REUNION.—Members and friends of the First Independent Society are invited to meet at the residence of Mr. Richard Mott, 36 Jefferson street, on Wednesday evening, Dec. 20.

Poetry,

[For THE INDEX.]
UNDER ONE ROOF.

All under one roof my children slept,
Two—four—and five were eleven;
All under one roof my children slept,—
Under that roof was my Heaven.

Out into the world my children went,
Four this way, and that way seven;
Still under one roof my children slept—
All-covering roof of Heaven!

Down into the grave my children went,
The four, and after, the seven;
Yet under one roof my children slept,
The immortal roof of Heaven.

All under one roof God's children dwell;
One shelter to all is given,
Home, or abroad, or living or dead,
All-sheltering Love of Heaven!

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.
The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 26, 1872. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

A FRIEND IN LONDON.

It is with the greatest pleasure that we announce the name of the Rev. Charles Voysey, of London, as a regular contributor to THE INDEX for 1872. He very kindly promises a monthly letter, and at least six of his unpublished discourses during the year, as special contributions to our columns. He says:—"I have recently been preaching sermons at St. George's Hall which are simply 'clamored for.' I am besieged with applications for them in print. They are upon—'What think ye of Christ?' I could send you the first two for use in December and January, if you wish it." We hope to receive these discourses without delay, though Mr. Voysey may possibly retain them till our reply has been received. But we shall publish them immediately on their arrival; and we doubt not they will be read by the American public with as much eagerness as his widely admired lecture on the Bible.
Mr. Voysey is also so kind as to say (the italics are his):—"To all my friends here I mention it [THE INDEX], and to many I lend it as the only paper of its kind in either hemisphere. . . . By and by I will make arrangements to have a certain number of

THE INDEX sent to me regularly for sale, as I think it an enormous pity that it is not extensively known in England."
With such encouragement as this, we trust our friends will make vigorous efforts to increase the circulation of the paper here at home. Our own labor is unremitting to make it worthy of the support of the liberal public, as the best possible organ of the ripest and best thought of the age. We have other plans in reserve, to be announced as fast as their success is assured; and we may say confidently that, without being enlarged externally, THE INDEX for 1872 will be found to weigh more than many "blanket sheets" rolled in one, and not be "heavy" either. While thus devoting all our energies to building up the best liberal weekly ever yet published anywhere in the world, as an exponent of the most highly cultivated thought and the most earnest religious aspiration of the century, we ask our friends to second our efforts by helping to increase the number of its readers. If truth has any value to us, let us prove it by our deeds.

ONLY HALF WAKED UP.

The Christian Register is interested in every part of our late article on "Unitarianism," except that which relates to the definition of Unitarianism made by the Supreme Court of New Hampshire at the special request of Unitarian laymen, backed by many distinguished Unitarian clergymen. That is very uninteresting. In fact, we agree with the Register that the less said about that definition, the better for that nebulous species of Christianity known as Unitarianism. These hard-headed lawyers have such an uncomfortable way of pinning you down to your own words as if you meant something by them,—for instance, of taking it for granted that you mean Christianity when you say Christianity, and therefore must be bound by a fair interpretation of the Christian name if you claim the benefit of it in courts of law,—that it is quite pardonable in the Register to attempt to divert attention from the main point by raising little side-issues. So it makes fun of philanthropy in the following hysterical style:—
"THE INDEX is saddened by the sight of many 'brave and earnest young men' in the ranks of the Unitarian ministry, where they are 'used as servants' by the denomination. This pity is very touching, really contagious. We have caught it ourselves. Poor young fellows! They cannot fairly be said to 'hug their fetters to their hearts,' for they do not know that they have any chains. They are blind to their bondage, and deaf to the demands for shibboleths that have been made upon them. No black men at the South were ever such contented slaves. They have countenanced the expression of a desire to be followers of Christ, instead of marching abreast of him, if not far in advance. And they might be so easily emancipated! They have only to step outside of Christianity, and join with the Free Religionists, and all will be well with them. The issue between Religion and Liberty is never distinctly made, of course. The only warfare known is between Christianity and Freedom, of course. There is no natural love of leadership, no party spirit, in the Religious Association where you are free to be religious or not. Young Unitarian ministers, is there no gratitude, no tenderness left in your stony breasts? Can you, unmoved, behold Free Religion leaders vainly wiping their weeping eyes on account of your unconscious servitude? Those gentle showers of grief will never cease to fall until you join the new sect."
Here is a manifest call for handkerchiefs. It seems that there is a new "sect" somewhere, and that some of its "leaders" have been crying. But it will take the inventive genius of the Register to tell where, or who. Its laughter sounds a little convulsive; but that may be the fault of our ears, after all. Like Mark Tapley, the Register deserves "credit for being jolly" under the circumstances.
We are not aware that the "issue between Religion and Liberty" has ever been "distinctly made." If it ever is made, we shall be found unmistakably on the side of Liberty, and not "on the fence" by the Register's side. As we are waiting, however, to learn more on this subject from our blithe contemporary, we postpone further remark on it for the present.

But that the issue between Christianity and Freedom is not only "distinctly made," but distinctly made in the columns of the Register itself, appears from the very same paper that contains the above lively paragraph. Prof. C. C. Everett, of the Cambridge Divinity School, confessedly one of the finest scholars and ablest thinkers of the Unitarian denomination, and undoubtedly as fair a representative as can be found of the most advanced thought that is compatible with allegiance to Christianity, has just given one of the Boston lectures on "Rational Christianity," which we find reported on the same page with the above implied denial of the possibility of any such issue. We quote a passage:—

"If there appear at first sight an antagonism between what we call the spirit of the age and the spirit of Christ, it only shows the need which each has of the other,—Christ needs the spirit of the nineteenth century, and it in turn needs him. Even if we comprehended the whole of his spirit as it was at first understood, it would still need to be completed by that of the age, and that not from any lack in himself. We are not to touch upon the limit of his insight; enough to say that he himself recognized the limits of his work when he said—'I have many things to say unto you, but you cannot bear them now.'"

The italics are ours. They emphasize a distinct avowal that the insight of Jesus must not be called in question, but rather, so far as modern believers are concerned, must be treated as sacred from all criticism. He was not omniscient in fact; but he was omniscient so far as we are concerned. His words, once decided to be historic, must not be doubted. Thought must not venture to dispute the infallibility of his utterances. This, if we mistake not, is the real meaning of the passage we quote from Prof. Everett. Yet, although he apparently denies the reality of the "antagonism between the spirit of the age and the spirit of Christ," we could not find a plainer proof of it than his own words. They make a most decided issue between Christianity and Freedom. Freedom demands that no man's "insight" shall be assumed to be perfect, or treated as perfect; and it rejects the assumption that the insight of Jesus should be treated with any more tenderness or timidity than that of any other man. It says:—"Test the insight of Jesus by your own insight. Put it to the proof. Weigh it. Sit in judgment on it. Allow Jesus no more influence than belongs to the intrinsic truthfulness of his words. Make no assumption that his wisdom is complete because it is his. Emancipate yourself from the crushing tyranny of his reputation, and oppose to it the unbending independence of a free mind."
Thus the Register itself testifies to the issue it impliedly denies. Let us see if it can prove the other issue it impliedly affirms.
Carlyle, in his "French Revolution" (Vol. 1, p. 129), calls Bishop Talleyrand-Perigord "a man living in falsehood, and on falsehood—yet not what you can call a false man." There you have a startlingly true portrait, sketched by genius at a stroke. What a family likeness in all priests!

A NEGATIVE SYSTEM.

D'Aubigne, summing up the results of Luther's Reformation, makes the triumph of evangelical Christianity lie mainly in its denials. "Whereas Rationalism, Mysticism, and Roman Catholicism admit a permanent inspiration in some of our fellow-creatures, and thus open the door to all kinds of eccentricities and exceptions, evangelical Christianity recognizes that inspiration only in the writings of the apostles and prophets." Thus, by his own admission, evangelical Christians believe less, not more, than these other classes; for these others believe, or may consistently believe, not only in the inspiration of Jesus and the apostles, but in that of many besides. In such a case I prefer to hold with those who believe the most.

It is not common to find Christian writers who are so frank, on this point, as D'Aubigne. Our public teachers cannot yet outgrow the traditional imputation on those who think for themselves, that they are "unbelievers." Good Dr. Greer, for instance, writing in an unusually tolerant spirit, in his book on "The Conversion of St. Paul," says that we not only "want earnest Christians," but we want "earnest unbelievers" as well. This he vindicates by asserting that no earnest unbeliever ever died without believing. "Where," he asks, "is the unbelieving man to whom Christ is preached who can rise up in his place and declare that in his resistance he has not again and again stifled the motions of conscience?" Now I suppose that I am one of those whom he would designate by this unfavorable epithet, "unbelieving," and certainly I have had Christ preached to me, in the ordinary sense, many times; and yet I can honestly say that I never once stifled the slightest motion of conscience in holding my present opinion, and the same must be equally true of thousands of others. And probably the reason why conscience has not, in this case, been moved, is that there was nothing to move it; nay, the very epithet of "unbelieving" is misapplied to those who are not found in the act of rejection, but of larger affirmation. If a man believes Shakespeare the only poet who ever lived, he has a right to his opinion, but he is surely an unbeliever as to all other poets. Whereas a man who believes that not Shakespeare alone, but a vast number of others, and indeed all in their degree, share the poetic nature—he may be right or wrong, but he certainly cannot be called an unbeliever.

And what is true in the classification of opinions as to poetic gifts must be true of all other gifts. It is absurd to say that he who believes less is "believing," and he who believes more is "unbelieving."

I do not mean to imply that either of these words is honorable or dishonorable in itself; that depends on the particular thing that is offered, to be accepted or denied. I only wish to state the facts, though it is fair to say, besides, that in looking at a man's whole attitude, the act of believing, as being a positive thing, seems more generous and noble than that of disbelieving. That is why so many of us unceasingly pity those who believe so little—who, instead of studying and loving the piety and noble ethics of the human race, insist on limiting themselves to one line of human development, and denying, like D'Aubigne, the possibility of divine inspiration except to a handful of Jewish men.

A STRAW ON THE STREAM.

A London correspondent to the Christian Register informs us of a straw or two which he saw on the current of religious thought among the English Unitarians. He happened to be present at a conference of Unitarian ministers in London where the question came up whether any more distinct organization of their churches was possible or desirable; and, says he—"The prevailing, almost unanimous, sentiment was in the negative. The American experiment was adduced as a warning,—resulting in the necessity of shutting somebody out, &c." James Martineau, W. H. Channing, Mr. Ierison, who spoke at the Free Religious meeting in Boston last May, were present, and several other prominent Unitarian clergymen. It seems that they took "warning" from the attempt of American Unitarians to form a denominational organization. They believed in individual freedom and ecclesiastical independence and the congregational polity, and they saw that these were demanded as a sacrifice on the altar of denominational ambition and activity in this country. They, like some of their American brethren, would not make that sacrifice themselves nor exact it of others. They are called Unitarians, but practically they adhere to Free Religion. They would make no doctrinal boundary to their fellowship. They would keep their ministerial associations so free that any man who has the desire to join them should be at liberty to do so. No creed or creedlet should bar his admittance. It is upon such Unitarians as these that the real mantle of Dr. Channing has fallen rather than upon the Unitarian creed-makers and denominational enthusiasts in this country. These bear, perhaps, the Channing name, but they have nothing of the Channing spirit. Like the Pilgrims, they believe in liberty of conscience; liberty to worship God as they please, and the liberty to make every one else worship God in the same way that they do. The lamented Dr. Gannett, in his address at the Commemorative services for Dr. Channing in Boston, in 1867, said:—"Dr. Channing would not permit his views to be circumscribed by sectarian bounds and retreated from any attempt at denominational organization." The reason was that he was jealous of his own liberty, and too just and fair to wish to impose any restraints on another's liberty. From this free spirit of the "founder of Unitarianism," what a falling off do we see! The tendency of the majority of American Unitarians is towards that "denominational organization" which Channing opposed.

They have already organized upon a narrow Christian basis and restricted their fellowship to Christian bounds. They believe in boundless freedom within Christian limits. You are perfectly free to follow truth provided you will bind yourself to follow Christ. You may have Reason for your guide if you will acknowledge the leadership and lordship of Jesus. You are perfectly free to take Truth for your authority provided you will first confess the authority of the Christ as "the truth, way, and life." You will be considered as sound in the faith if you will shout "liberty and Christ, now and forever, one and inseparable." But if you cannot pronounce this shibboleth, then you are politely invited to sit down on the door-step of their generous hospitality.

Now we are right glad that these English Unitarians have taken "warning" from the "American experiment;" for that ended in "shutting somebody out." It ended in weakening and alienating the sympathy of a large part of the young and vigorous and liberal element. That element will in time join the Free Religious movement. At present many of these men are nominally Unitarian; but they are beginning to see, notwithstanding the glamour of personal interest, that they are really wearing a dogmatic yoke and that it is galling them. They train with the "liberty and Christ" party on holiday and parade occasions, in full uniform, perhaps, but with empty cartridge boxes. When they shout their battle-cry of "Christ and freedom," the Christ is often left out or muttered low with some "mental reservation," while the word freedom comes out full and sonorous, showing where the heart is. These men are coming over to the Free Religious movement by twos and threes and larger squads, and it has been hinted that the younger Unitarian preachers would come over boldly and in whole battalions, if Free Religion had a better commissariat. It has a good supply of liberty, light, and heat, but its adherents are doing hard service on short rations, and have little but "hard tack" and salt to tempt those men of the Chadband stripe, who are "followers of the Lamb" (shall we say it?) because they love a leg of mutton: which, as Lincoln would say, reminds us of a story.

A Jew was observed looking very intently at a prodigious, fine ham. Said a bystander, "What are you saying to that ham, Mr. Jacobs?" "I was saying to it—Thou almost persuadest me to be a Christian." Free Religion has no Christian hams to convince those whose reason is susceptible to such argument. Smoked hams are only logic to smoky consciences. Free Religion has no room for such recruits. Its call is for men who love liberty and light, truth and right, and are willing to do and dare and sacrifice something for it.

We know that free religious work is not to be measured by those who make public professions, for there are hundreds who are in full sympathy with it when in their closet and the door is closed and who are working in a quiet way for freereligious principles, but who manifest no knowledge of the organized movement when in public. However, we do detect in the public utterances of both clergy and laity that the free faith and broad spirit of human fellowship is getting hold of them. Liberty is contagious. It works slowly, perhaps, but surely. These liberal English Unitarians might have crystallized around a creed, like their American brethren, had it not been that they saw that the "American experiment" was a failure and took "warning" from the standing protest which the Free Religious movement is to any such attempt. We think this is a pretty large straw on the stream. It shows us how the Gulf-stream of free thought is running.

"HARSH LANGUAGE," AND "PERSONALITY."

Friends, as well as opponents, of the ideas contained in the tracts "intended to teach religion without superstition," have objected to many of those tracts as "unnecessarily provoking," "showing an unkind spirit," "singling out classes, and even persons, for attack," "too harsh," "too personal."

The view upon which these objections are founded has much plausibility and some reason in it. Other things being equal, it is desirable that an argument should be stated without personality, and that a defender of truth should refrain from censure of the advocates of the other persuasion. Since, then, I agree with my critics in this general position, it is but fair that I should state the particular circumstances which have induced me, in this case, to take the course they object to.

I was not unmindful of the considerations above mentioned, while writing the very things criticised. One of the tracts in the first series ("Learn by Experience") was most carefully prepared in such a manner as to make no unkind accusation, to be conciliatory, to bring no weight but that of facts to bear upon my opponents. And, before finishing the revision of some tracts which are specially severe, I have gone over them again to see what points of the severity could properly be dispensed with. So much of that character, then, as yet remains, remains because I have deliberately judged it needful. It seems but fair, therefore, as I have said, that I should make known the reason which, in this case, seemed to me to require the severity.

Feeling very keenly the mental and moral injury which was inflicted on me (with the best intentions) by the strictly orthodox education under which I grew to the age of manhood, my chief desire in these publications has been to protect the weak and ignorant from such tyranny as I underwent, and to enable them to answer some of the specious pretences made by the propagandists of orthodoxy.

In the method of proselytism used by the leaders and more zealous members of the Young Men's Christian Association an influence of exceptional and remarkable character is brought to bear upon the outsider addressed. Even before any argument or exhortation is made, there is the pressure of a peculiar power, a prestige, a moral influence, an aspect of authority, an assumption of superiority, an attitude of quasi consecration, in the demeanor of the "pious" man addressing one who is not "pious," which weighs, and is sometimes made to weigh heavily, upon the latter.

Here are two persons, equally created by God, and placed in the world to discover and work out God's intentions in regard to them. One meets the other, and, calling himself "one of God's people," addresses the other as "a sinner," and proceeds, as one having authority, to catechise, lecture and admonish him. Orthodox church-members, as a class, have got into the way of considering it not only their right, but their duty, to do this. In their church-meetings, they assume it to be unquestionably a duty, and stimulate each other to the more thorough performance of it.

Now most of the men who commit this impertinence and presumption are not personally arrogant. With them, to assume this attitude is a fulfilment of supposed duty, a "taking up of their cross." But the position itself is insufferably arrogant. The system of faith which requires this of people who wish to lead Christian lives is an imposition upon them, as well as upon that vastly larger class of whom they think and speak as "sinners."

First, then, I wish to call public attention (that is to say, the attention both of the pious, and of the community dominated by the pious) to the essential falseness of this position taken by the former party. I wish to vindicate and emphasize the great truth that the relations of fatherhood in God and of sonship in men are fully established by the creation of the latter by the former; and that the ignorant and the prodigals are God's children, loved and cared for here, and sure to be permanently loved and cared for, just as much as the saints.

(As the truth here emphasized is sure to be misrepresented by those members of the Y. M. C. A. who see it, and may possibly be misinterpreted by a hasty reader, let me explain that it does not in the least imply that God's love and care are irrespective of the character of him to whom they are applied. A part of God's care is discipline, retribution, a course of treatment designed and suited to deter men from sin, and incite them to right conduct. Suffering will follow evil-doing in the next world at least as much as in this; and the bad man who does not repent and reform here will have that unpleasant duty to perform on the other side; and will never find true welfare till he does it.)

I wish to relieve the weak and ignorant, yes, and the prodigal too, from the feeling that, when he does begin to recognize the claims of conscience and duty, he is bound to accept the theories of the pious people, and blindly follow their lead. I wish him to recognize the fact that God, his Father, can and does speak within him, and that his allegiance is due to that voice, far rather than to the "drummers" of the Young Men's Christian Association.

The consideration above referred to is strengthened by the fact that absolute misguiding, a persistent saying of that which is not, is a part of the settled policy of the Young Men's Christian Association towards those weak and ignorant people whom they take in hand for direction. Take, for instance, their two utter misrepresentations about their Sunday-sabbath; first, that its observance is a matter of God's appointment; next, that that appointment is recorded in the Bible. They shut out from their reading-rooms the tract of the evangelical Henry Grew upon that subject, just as much as the series of tracts "intended to teach religion without superstition." And of the hundreds whom I have asked, as a favor, to show me any perversion of Scripture on this subject, either in Grew's tract or any of my own, not one has ever attempted it. Cart-ropes won't drag them to discuss the Sabbath with one who understands the teaching of the New Testament about it. But to the weak and ignorant they keep on making the old misrepresentations; and they warn their proselytes against tracts teaching the Scriptural doctrine of the Sabbath, as "infidel tracts."

In this state of things, it seems to me that just the sort of plain speaking I use is required, and is beneficial. My work is a much-needed aid to the weak against the injustice of the strong; and I do not find this particular work done in any other quarter.

Let me state the case again, in other words.

The Young Men's Christian Association being not only in good repute and highly esteemed in general, but being credited, through the peculiar character of their professions, with both eminent goodness and eminent wisdom, have a sort of dignity and weight, in relation to the rest of the community, such as the nobility hold to the commonalty in Great Britain, or such as "seniors" hold to "freshmen," or teachers to pupils. They are thought "to have attained" They possess something which other persons have not, and yet believe they ought to have. When these people speak of religion to others, they speak as "experts" to ignoramuses. When they quote from the Bible, they quote what they are presumed to be familiar with, and to understand; and, being such good people, it is taken for granted that they will report correctly what they do report.

Now my ground is, first, that outsiders, when accosted by these people, feel constrained to defer to their presumed better knowledge, and to receive what they say submissively. They do not feel at liberty to contest any ground taken by the exhorter, because he is good as well as wise; and they do not feel capable of contesting it, for want of acquaintance with the subject. Thus the "sinners" are doubly at disadvantage when taken to task by the saints.

Now, if this catechising and lecturing of the sinners by the saints were merely sincere and truthful efforts at propagandism—the use of right means to a (supposed) good end,—I should never interfere with it except by courteous criticism of the false doctrines belonging to their system. Those people have a right to teach what they think true, as far as they use true and just measures to that end. But when their high estimation in the community, their dignity, credit and piety are made the cloak for false pretences—are used to constrain ignorant and confiding persons to the reception of dogmas clearly untrue,—the critic has a second duty imposed upon him. He must not only untwist the fallacies and expose the false dogmas, but must openly challenge the sanctimonious aspect which caused those fallacies and falsehoods to be received. He must call these preachers of untruths to account before the world, and let them understand that a lie in their mouths, for the increase of their church-membership, is to be ranked precisely with the tradesman's lie for the increase of his gains.

SPECIAL PROVIDENCE.

Great calamities, wholesale slaughters, immense holocausts of God's children, are looked upon by many of our evangelical Christians as judgments under a special Providence for the wrong-doings and shortcomings of men.

Hair-breadth escapes from death, a solitary family saved from a general carnage, and the lonely building which is left standing in great conflagrations, are cases of special interposition also, and the pious souls take infinite delight in turning up their eyes and drawing down their long faces, proclaiming to the world that "the Lord giveth and the Lord taketh away; blessed be the name of the Lord."

Last Sunday was a great day among the metropolitan pulpits for blowing off this pious small talk, and attempting to make God monstrous.

Rev. Dr. Duncan, a Baptist, evidently was possessed of a savage delight in contemplating the great trial of Chicago and its "baptism of fire."

He said:—"Since the beginning of the present year God had been speaking in his judgments. The tendency in our land was toward infidelity and forgetfulness of God, who by a signal display vindicates His majesty and teaches men humility by humbling their pride in the dust. The repeated judgments with which God was visiting our country were designed to rebuke the people for their worldliness, iniquity and impiety. These calamities were the marks of God's displeasure, in witnessing the increase of wickedness. Fire was an agent of the judgment of Sodom and Gomorrah, of Jerusalem, of Tyre and of Moab, for sins of which this nation also was guilty. The best guardians of our property are the men who, morning and evening, implore the favor and protection of God, for God often mitigates His judgments for the sake of the righteous."

A man who stands up in the pulpit in this enlightened Nineteenth Century, and thus reviles and blasphemes his creator, is to be pitied from the bottom of the soul by every respectable person who refuses to throw aside his manhood and submissively bow to such cant.

Does this zealous Baptist for a moment suppose that God takes pleasure in the wails of the fatherless and innocent children suffering for the sins of others?

The poor deluded bigot who would make these accusations against the great Omnipotent receives his inspiration from the old Hebraic record, wherein is taught the diabolical theory of innocent people suffering for the guilty by whole cities and countries, and on one occasion one family alone survived the universal destruction of every living and creeping thing.

The poor man cannot be expected to act better than he supposes his God acts. He does not pretend to believe in a merciful God, whose loving-kindness is over all his works, whose love endureth forever; but the God of his idolatry is an austere, revengeful deity, "riding upon the whirlwind and the storm," who has created a hell to punish a part of his children in without end.

Should we expect any different view of this awful calamity from such a man, actuated and inspired by such opinions of God?

INTUITION AND INSTINCT.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—Instinct and Intuition are different names for the same thing. It is inherited conviction. It differs from reason in this respect. By reason we arrive at convictions from a process which takes place in our own minds; while by instinct we inherit convictions from our progenitors as the result of processes which have taken place in their mind. To illustrate: the shepherd dog through many generations of training acquires a capacity and disposition to take care of cattle which is transmitted to his posterity in the form of an instinct for the same occupation. A man whose progenitors have been religious for generations, or whose father and mother were religious at a proper time to transmit their convictions to him is religious by instinct.

I could add examples indefinitely but the above is sufficient to give my view of how intuitive or instinctive ideas are generated. Instinct is not always reliable; it is subject to all the errors of individual reason.

I will not trespass further on your space.

"QUESTIONS FOR THE ORTHODOX" ANSWERED.

1. Does the salvation of men depend in any special sense on the life or death of Jesus Christ?
2. Did the excellence of character and person in Jesus Christ differ in kind, or in degree, or both, from that possessed by men of to-day?
3. Does man really need a Mediator (a middle power or means) that he may come to God?
4. Is it a fact that the development of my spiritual nature, the growth of the soul in righteousness and Godliness both of heart and mind, is the work of Jesus Christ, operating upon me or within me (I being conscious or unconscious of his presence)?
5. If experience and discipline shall have so attuned the man that the soul's music shall be sweeter and its power greater than the desire of sense is strong, will not his effort to realize his ideal virtues in daily life, the strengthening influence of good deeds done and kind words spoken by him, his aspiration to know the "open secret" of the universe, work in him righteousness (right-mindedness) and Godliness (God-likeness)?

Very respectfully yours,
L. F. GARDNER.

As your correspondent suggests that "brother Howard" answer the foregoing, I hasten to do so; and as your space is limited, I will answer in the briefest possible manner.

1. It depends on the suffering and death of Christ. "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from sin."

2. Both.

3. He does.

4. It is. "Christ in you." Col. 1: 27.

5. To some extent. No man, however, can ever become radically righteous—can ever become eminently godly without piety toward God,—without the experience of the life and power of God in the soul. Let but "the word of Christ dwell in us richly," then shall we "in all wisdom teach and admonish one another, and with psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, sing with grace in our hearts to the Lord." Many by a blessed personal experience know all this to be true. May your correspondent and all your readers enter into a like blessed and saving knowledge!

R. H. HOWARD.

Among the innumerable articles sent to Capt. Hall to cheer his journey in the Polar regions was a tin can carefully sealed, and labelled "not to be opened until the Polar has reached the Arctic seas." But on its passage to the Navy Yard it met with an accident, and the secret leaked out. It was a can of patent axle grease, with which Capt. Hall, or his survivors, were affectionately requested by letter to lubricate the axle of this venerable planet.

LIBERALISM.

The following fine article from the Williams Vindicator (Nov. 11), published in Williamstown, Mass., by the Senior and Junior classes of Williams College, is a noteworthy sign of the times. If this is the style of thought current among the students of evangelical colleges, the cause of free and national religion is sure to triumph in America. The "great religious weeklies" should learn wisdom and a higher faith from this brave and reverent young writer.

Is it strange that students, who, as a class, should always be the most thoughtful, now and then overstep the lines in which their instructors strive to confine them, and seek to find out for themselves why "these things are so?" Is it strange that they sometimes turn to examine the religious questions of the time? Is it strange that, when once they look at them, very many of the faiths they have held heretofore should melt like wax in a too firm grasp? We trow not. Yet there seems to be prevalent, among a large class of people, a feeling of surprise that colleges are so rapidly becoming what they are pleased to call "hot-beds of infidelity."

Men who have never given the subject an hour's dispassionate thought, and who have become radically incapable of doing so, wonder at this. Men who do not know that every tenet and maxim and ceremony of the early Christian religion can be traced back to others preceding and surrounding it, are amazed because those who do cannot believe it to be divine and alone divine. If they would but remember that some men must think and reason about their creed in religion, as well as their creed in politics or business, and that the student is, by the very fact of being a student, one of these, they would understand how repugnant to him are the superstitious puerilities—the tragicomic absurdities of Calvinistic Protestantism.

We have no doubt that the time is rapidly coming in this country, and coming first to thoughtful young men, when the peremptory dogmas of this creed will be valued at their true worthlessness. That time has come already to many students who have been brought up in its straitest lines. But such are not, therefore, infidels; they see no better reason for accepting the infallibility of the Calvinistic doctrine, than for believing the infallibility of the Pope; they can discover no foundation in reason for either, and they cannot conceive of God as commanding or wishing any thing that is not founded there. For the same cause they hesitate to admit the inspiration of the Bible, in the sense in which that word is generally used. So far as all truth is divine and inspired, so far is the truth of the Bible and the Koran and the Vedas as well.

But they cannot believe that the Bible, and the Bible alone, is the direct utterance of God. Some may call this infidelity, but it is not. It is a broader, higher faith; a faith narrowed by no petty sectarian limits, but wide-reaching as the race, catholic as truth. It is a faith that sees in the grand monotheism of Islamism inspiration as divine as in the same doctrine of Christianity; that reverences as highly the Golden Rule of Confucius, as that of Jesus.

Pres. Hopkins says that the limit of true liberalism is where it begins to become negative—where, ceasing to affirm, it commences to deny. That limit is behind such liberalism as this rather than before it; a bound from which it is ever receding, rather than one toward which it tends. It recognizes and worships all truth. It sees in different religions only different approaches, more or less tortuous and blind, whereby all men seek to enter the same Holy of Holies. It condemns no man to an eternal exclusion therefrom because he has chanced to set his foot to one of these doors rather than another. Instead, it seeks to broaden them all, so that every soul may find ever open before him an easy entrance, in whatever corner of the world his lot may be. It would grant to each alike the chance of entering there, whether Christian or Moslem, Buddhist or Jew; whether a believer in the Bible, or one who never heard of it.

This is the liberalism toward which the age tends, which has already received into its broad bosom thousands of the thoughtful students of this and other lands, and which is looked upon by other thousands of equally good men with a holy horror. For our part we welcome it with open hearts. Let all the alloy of truth and error that passes current among all men be cast into the crucible, and let us preserve all the gold that comes forth, no matter with what base metal it may once have been alloyed.

FIDES.

This is the way a Western lecturer explained a phenomenon:—"You have seen a cow, no doubt. Well, a cow is not a phenomenon. You have seen an apple-tree. Well, an apple tree is not a phenomenon. But when you see the cow go up the tree tail foremost, to pick the apples, it is a phenomenon."

When will boys learn to respect the Sabbath? Here is one out in Indiana, who stopped to play on the bank of a river while going to Sunday school, fell in, and so injured his clothes that his parents had to get him a complete and beautiful new suit.

An old lady followed up an Episcopal bishop as he travelled through his diocese, and was confirmed several times before she was detected. She wished the ordinance repeated, because she "had understood it was good for the rheumatism."

ATHANASE COQUEREL ON CATHOLICISM

Superstition was stronger in the days of Rome than at any other time. Birds and chickens decided the fate of armies or individuals. Signs and portents were more numerous and absurd; and Mr. Coquerel showed by illustration the extent to which they had been perpetrated in the Romish Church. The old Romans were suffering, also, from Polytheism, and there is never any reason in Polytheism to stop the number of gods. There are reckoned to have been 30,000 of them, and they were constantly adding to them. Nothing happened more frequently than apotheosis. At the same time there was a movement really religious among the heathen in the mysteries of Bacchus, &c. It is not strange to find that these mysteries have been carried into Roman Christianity. Many Christian symbols and ceremonies are nothing but the old mysteries adapted more or less to Christianity. The Passion play at Oberammergau in Bavaria is the legacy of a Pagan idea. If we could call Scipio from his tomb at Rome to-day, he would recognize nearly everything in their religious worship. Mr. Coquerel then traced the history of sacrifice from the primitive religion down to its incorporation into the Romish Church, noticing the great priestly power and privilege that accompanied it. The history of images was likewise noticed. We, perhaps, think that the nimbus or aura in the Romish pictures of Christ is new; but it existed around the heads of heroes in Grecian times. And if we look at the history of sacred imagery among the Roman Catholics, we will find images which show the transition from Pagan to Christian imagery, and some of which we cannot say whether they are most heathen or most Roman Catholic. There are images of Christ about which it is impossible to know whether it is Christ or Mercury, or what not. The early representations of Christ were as the Good Shepherd; only they represented him, not as a Jew with long beard and flowing gown, but as a young man with short cropped hair, without beard, and with a short tunic falling not below the knee. And there is a famous sarcophagus where Christ is represented as a young man without beard, holding a paper in his hand, and the Apostles around him, and beneath is the heathen god Uranus, representing sky, to show that Christ is superior to this world.

In the present time three great changes have been introduced into the Roman Catholic religion. The first is that Mary is exempted from original sin. This is an Andalusian dogma. It was a great triumph for the Jesuits when the Pope declared it. It meant also that the Pope had a right to declare a dogma without consulting the Church. When he had done this, he went a little further. A council was called at Rome, which declared that the Pope is alone infallible. It comes according to the law of development. It is the legitimate and natural end of Roman Catholicism. And when I say end, I mean what I say. I do not mean that Roman Catholicism is to disappear, and that in a few years it will be extinct. But Roman Catholicism has lost something in our time. It has lost Rome, though in one sense this is a great advantage to the Pope and the Roman Catholics. They governed so badly that their power was a loss to them. We must not go to sleep saying we have no fear. What we must understand is this: that there is a concentration of power and will. There has been an accumulation for many centuries of an encroaching power, obliging people to renounce their judgment. We see its grand result when a congregation believe that at the word of a priest bread becomes God, and that that priest sacrifices by eating God. What is the result? That he has eminent power, and they must obey him.

In my own country I will only say that a movement toward Protestantism exists. There are many people who say they cannot live longer in the Roman faith. They cannot believe in the Virgin Mary, or that the Pope is infallible. They believe hardly anything. Some ask for the gospel, but many thousands know nothing about it. They have been born in the Roman Catholic religion, and they hate it. They refuse to believe in God or a future life. Against both assumptions, the assumption that priestcraft is right, and the assumption that there is nothing to believe, we have to fight; and you will have to fight against it here. We need to teach them to see by their own eyes; to be men, and not to be obliged to repeat the words of a priest.—Ex.

SPEAKING of Bible societies, Coleridge once remarked: "There can be no doubt that these are good men, very good men, who are so zealous in widely spreading these societies. It is pity they want sagacity enough to foresee that in sending the Bible thus everywhere among the uninstructed and the reprobate, they will be propagating, instead of the old idolatry, a new bibliolatry."

Two little girls, eight and ten years old, were gravely discussing the question of wearing ear-rings. One thought it was wicked. The other was sure it could not be, for so many good people wear them. The first replied, "Well, I don't care; if it wasn't wicked, God would have made holes in our ears."

Dr. Paley, whose Natural Theology and books of Christian evidence are still printed and circulated by religious tract and book societies, was so fond of going to the play that he would walk ten or twelve miles into London, and go without his dinner, for the sake of attending the theatre.

THE AREA OF THE CHICAGO FIRE.—Careful measurements and calculations of the area of the burnt district of the city place its length, from its starting point to its place of ending, at four and a half miles, and its average width a little over one mile. Along the south side lake shore, however, and westward five blocks, Harrison street is the southern limit of the conflagration, and the distance from that street to Fullerton avenue, its northern limit, is only three and a half miles. The point of the fires beginning on the west side was about one mile south of Harrison street, south-westerly.

The number of acres laid waste is not far from 3,300. A pretty careful computation places the number of buildings of all kinds destroyed at 18,000, of which at least 1,500 were substantial business structures.

The actual total of the pecuniary losses is estimated at three hundred million dollars, but no fair estimate that we have yet seen or heard of places the grand total below two hundred million dollars. We still believe the latter will cover all the losses.—Chicago Journal.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

- O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
- THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of Newport, R. I.
- WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
- RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
- J. VILA BLAKE, of Boston, Mass.
- WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
- REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.

Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

INDEX TRACTS

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY. The first edition of this admirable Tract has been entirely exhausted; but a new edition will be ready in a week or two.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Chinese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution;" Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single Copies Ten Cents; Six Copies Fifty Cents; Twelve Copies One Dollar.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, is a scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One dollar.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, is a singularly felicitous treatment of a subject that interests everybody. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

Also, The Bible Argument Against Woman Stated and Answered from a Bible Standpoint, a pungent pamphlet by A. J. GROVER, is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion without Superstition

First Series, No. 1 to 20.

Second Series, Just Published—

21. Fanaticism: how displayed by well-meaning people in their judgment and action respecting religion in others.
22. Let your Faith honor God, not calumniate Him: reject all testimony that speaks ill of God.
23. Who Wrote It? a proper and needful inquiry when an unreasonable claim is urged on the ground that "it is written."
24. Periodical Prayer: ask when you want to ask; thank when you want to thank; be honest in prayer.
25. Hear the other Side: seek an intelligent faith, instead of blindly following ignorance and prejudice.
26. Man's Duty to God: above all things do not neglect it; but take care, too, not to be misled in regard to it.
27. Penny-wise, Pound-foolish: to claim divine inspiration for unworthy imputation on the divine character.
28. A Touchstone for false Teachers: God certainly gave reason and conscience to be our guides.
29. Justice and Love vs. Mercy: God's actual method better than the supposed "plan of salvation."
30. Prepared to Die: an unveiling of some clerical false pretences.
31. "Even as Others": showing a point of resemblance between the "evangelicals" and those believers whom they stigmatize as "unbelievers."
32. Do Men need Salvation? a look towards God directly, not through the dark-stained church-windows.
33. Unchangeable: will God ever refuse to welcome the repenting and returning sinner?
34. Lost Sinners: men sometimes lose their children: did God ever lose, can he lose, his children?
35. Times and Seasons: two false notions considered; one about Friday, one about Sunday.
36. Do they really believe it? cases where Orthodoxy follows tradition in opposition to Scripture.
37. The Boston Revival and its Leader: methods of operation of Rev. A. B. Earle, professional revivalist.
38. He Rejects the Bible: a false charge refuted, and the opposing truth clearly shown.

FREE RELIGION,

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FREE RELIGION IN A FREE STATE.

[An Essay read by F. E. Abbot at the Detroit Convention of the Free Religious Association, Dec. 8, 1871.]

A careful survey of facts seems to show that, although in every age and country individuals can be found who disclaim all reverence for religion, there has been no nation of any prominence in the world's history which has not had a religion of some kind. Even of the lowest and most brutal savage races which have come under actual observation, it cannot be regarded as proved that they have absolutely no religion at all.

In his "Journal of Researches," Mr. Darwin states [p. 230] his belief that, in "the extreme part of South America, man exists in a lower state of improvement than in any other part of the world;" yet even among the degraded and miserable Fuegians he discovered the rudimentary indications of religious ideas. "The nearest approach to a religious feeling," he says [p. 215], "which I heard of, was shown by York Minster, who, when Mr. Bynoe shot some very young ducklings as specimens, declared in the most solemn manner—'Oh Mr. Bynoe, much rain, snow, blow very much!' This was evidently a retributive punishment for wasting human food. . . . As far as we could make out, he seemed to consider the elements themselves as the avenging agents; it is evident in this case how naturally, in a race a little more advanced in culture, the elements would become personified."

If Mr. Darwin's observations in this case are to be accepted as sufficiently exact, they weaken somewhat the conclusions arrived at by Mr. Edward B. Tylor, of England, in his very recent and scholarly work entitled "Primitive Culture." Adopting [Vol. 1, p. 383], as a "minimum definition of Religion, the belief in Spiritual Beings," Mr. Tylor says:—"So far as I can judge from the immense mass of accessible evidence, we have to admit that the belief in spiritual beings appears among all low races with whom we have attained a thoroughly intimate acquaintance, whereas the assertion of absence of such belief must apply either to ancient tribes, or to more or less imperfectly described modern ones." It would seem as if York Minster's expectation that the weather itself would punish Mr. Bynoe for unnecessarily killing birds can hardly be dignified with the name of "belief in spiritual beings." I think, however, that there is great force in what Sir John Lubbock says ["Origin of Civilization," p. 121]:—"The question as to the general existence of religion among men is, indeed, to a great extent a matter of definition. If the mere sensation of fear, and the recognition that there are probably beings more powerful than man, are sufficient alone to constitute a religion, then we must, I think, admit that religion is general to the human race. But when a child dreads the darkness, and shrinks from a lightless room, we never regard that as an evidence of religion. Moreover, if this definition be adopted, we cannot longer regard religion as peculiar to man. We must admit that the feeling of a dog or a horse towards its master is of the same character; and the baying of a dog to the moon is as much an act of worship as some ceremonies which have been so described by travellers."

On the whole, I more than doubt whether the central fact of religion is to be found in the belief in spiritual beings, or indeed in a mere belief of any kind. I find this central fact rather in the practical effort, the exertion of volitional power, to obey a law conceived to be higher than the individual's inclination, passion, or self-interest. So considered, religion is a thing of infinitely various degrees; and the grade of its development must be estimated by the intrinsic elevation of the law as conceived, the nobility of the motives that urge obedience to it, and the fidelity shown in obeying it. This idea of religion can be applied to all conceivable cases, from the rudimentary scruples of York Minster against wanton waste of human food up to the grand refusal of Socrates to purchase his own life at the price of unfaithfulness to his duty. The poor Fuegian evidently considered the useless killing of ducks, where food was so scarce, as wrong, and therefore sure to be punished by the rain, the snow, and the wind. Here you have the crude ideas of a law superior to man, of an obligation to obey it, and of a retribution that would follow disobedience of it; yet you find no distinct conception of any "spiritual beings." Of course York Minster was superstitious; yet in this as in all other superstitions I think we may detect the germ of true religion in the nascent consciousness of an ideal law whose claim to be obeyed is supreme. He would evidently have approved as right the forbearance by Mr. Bynoe to shoot the ducks; and he evidently looked upon his act as the sailors in the "Ancient Mariner" looked upon the wanton slaughter of the albatross:—

"And I had done an hellish thing,
And it would work 'em woe;
For all averred I had killed the bird
That made the breeze to blow.
'Ah wretch!' said they, 'the bird to slay,
That made the breeze to blow!'"

If, then, my analysis is correct, the central fact of religion lies in the endeavor to obey a law felt to be superior to the individual's will—in other words, in the effort to perfect human life and character by carrying into practice a more or less elevated ideal of human conduct. No matter whether fear, hope, or disinterested love of right is the motive of this obedience, the essential fact remains that religion is not primarily belief, but action. Action implies belief, but belief does not imply action; and although there can be no action without pre-existent intellectual opinions, it should be emphasized that the distinctive sphere of religion is that of practical conduct. Belief should be governed by science; conduct should be governed by universal law, seen and felt to be binding on every individual. He is really the religious man who acts habitually with reference to some such law; and the character of his religion depends on the degree of enlightenment with which he conceives the law, the degree of fidelity with which he obeys it, and the degree of freedom, both outward and inward, with which he thus puts his ideal into real life. From York Minster to Socrates is a vast leap in the development of religion; but I think we shall more clearly apprehend the nature of religion if we perceive the essential identity of it under all its manifestations, even the most crude and superstitious.

Religion, then, is the practical effort of man to obey a law of felt obligation—namely, the ideal of what life ought to be, the ideal of the perfect humanity. There have been and are among men the most diverse conceptions of this law and of the sources of its obligation. A low type of religion represents it as the arbitrary will of gods and demons, and appeals to no motive but that of fear. The highest type of religion represents it as the necessary moral relations inherent in the very nature of things, independent of all will whatsoever; and it appeals chiefly to the love of virtue for its own sake. Between these extremes are countless intermediate grades. But various as are the ideals of men, religion is essentially the putting of them into practice, the conversion into action of what each man conceives to be his duty. Obedience to law, whether arbitrary or natural, and whether ignorantly or wisely conceived, is the one common fact that appears to me to be imbedded in the ceremonies, forms, tenets and practices of all religions; and it is the expression of a very widely-diffused yearning to perfect human life in all its varied aspects.

Here, then, in this fact that religion is a practical effort to conform human life to some law of acknowledged authority, either artificial or natural, and thereby to bring it into harmony with an ideal standard of perfection,—in this fact, I say, we can perceive the nature of the connection between religion and government. Both the one and the other rest on the idea of Law. The only difference is that the domain of government is restricted to certain external matters, while that of religion includes the entirety of human life. It is easy, then, to see that government and religion are related to each other as two concentric circles or spheres—that of government embracing only the most external actions of men, and that of religion embracing their whole outward and inward lives. There must be no conflict between these two laws of government and religion. So far as they both operate to affect conduct, they must absolutely harmonize. But religion should affect conduct in myriads of cases where government should be absolutely silent. Where this harmony does not prevail between the government and religion of any country, there will exist the most dangerous and destructive internal conflicts; as is well illustrated by the war of the Great Rebellion. The government of the country sustained slavery, and enjoined on all citizens practical respect for it. The living religion of the country forbade slavery, as the subversion of all human rights. Hence the conflict, and hence all the terrible misery which the conflict engendered.

Now there are, and can be, only two kinds of law, the one based on will (will of man or will of God), and the other based on reason, or rather the great system of natural laws of which reason is but the interpreter and expounder. All law is either artificial or natural. In the one case it rests on the will of the law-making power, for which no other reason can be rendered than "Sic volo—thus I will it!" In the other case it rests on no will whatever, but solely on the natural relations of things. The first says—"Thou shalt, or thou shalt not!" The second says—"Thou oughtest, or thou oughtest not!" There is no law or system of law affecting human conduct which cannot be reduced to one of these two classes.

As might be expected, we find different governments embodying these two different kinds of law; and we also find different religions embodying these two kinds of law. There is despotic government, and also free government. There is despotic religion, and also free religion. Both government and religion may rest on arbitrary will; both government and religion may rest on natural reason; or one may rest on reason while the other rests on will. In the cases where the government and the religion of any country both rest on the same kind of law, whether artificial or natural, the conditions exist for a homogeneous civilization, social stability, and political prosperity. But in all cases where the government rests on one kind while the religion rests on the other, the conditions exist for civil or religious contests of the most alarming character.

Fortunately all human conflicts tend to adjust themselves to a final harmony. There is nothing more rare in history than the long-continued equilibrium of opposing social forces. One side or the other will in the end win the victory, and peace will ensue until disturbed by a new conflict. To-day we live in one of these seasons of lull or temporary quietude. The great issue of political slavery is settled; the greater issue of spiritual slavery is not yet fairly opened. But I wish to point out the natural tendency which exists in every country to bring its government and its religion into harmony—to work out for itself a state of society from which all deep-seated antagonisms shall be eliminated. The pendulum does not more surely tend to assume a position of rest than does every great human community. It is quite impossible that any nation should long exist while the people cherish one set of principles in religion, and cherish a conflicting set of principles in politics; the tendency is inevitable to assimilate one to the other. Only by this ultimate assimilation can bewilderment and confusion be escaped in the world of practical life. Either the government will revolutionize the religion, or else the religion will revolutionize the government. Both will become despotic, or both free. The law of reason or the law of will must become at last supreme in both government and religion.

Allow me to contrast the state of the Old World with that of the New in this respect. All the governments of the Old World, with few and unimportant exceptions, are monarchies in some form or other. Neither in Europe, Asia, nor Africa is there yet established a single great or genuine republic. The Old World theory of government, greatly shaken, it is true, in modern times, but not yet overthrown, rests on the idea of arbitrary or artificial law—law simply enacted by a power not bound to render a reason for it. Whether the law-making power is an emperor, czar, king, sultan, mikado, or other monarch, the idea that he is directly responsible to the public reason and conscience is still an almost unintelligible novelty to the great bulk of the people, though rapidly spreading now in all directions. Even the English government, the least monarchical of all in the Old World, is based rather on the idea of precedent and usage than that of reason; the statutes and social adjustments of past generations are still accepted with a vast amount of unreasoning and unreasonable reverence for tradition. In short, the Old World still lives politically by the artificial law of will rather than by the natural law of reason.

How is it, then, with the religions of the Old World? Are they based on the same law of will? It can scarcely be doubted. All the mythologies of antiquity present the same hierarchy of celestial powers, with a king of the gods at the summit, whose will is the supreme law to all mankind. If the idea of a republican government is strange to the Old World, the idea of a republican religion is ridiculous to it. There is no need that I should run over the list of the various religions—they are all alike in the main, with the partial exception of the extreme Orient. The government of Heaven is supposed to be simply a copy in large of the governments of the earth. Judaism and Christianity, which more immediately concern us, are notable illustrations of this. The ancient Hebrew theocracy, with the will of Jehovah as its supreme law, reappears in the Christian Kingdom of Heaven, with the will of Christ supreme as the Divinely appointed vicegerent of God. The great Roman Catholic Church, with its Pope as supreme temporal and spiritual sovereign, does but add to the general belief of a Christ King in the heavens the visible fact of a Vicar of Christ on earth. In the Protestant Churches this visible representation of Christ by a temporal and spiritual Pope has been discarded for the sake of a more subtle but equally despotic Pope—the Bible. But the monarchy of Heaven is still humbly obeyed, no higher law being recognized by Christians than the will of Christ; Protestants sing still with undiminished ardor the old hymn—

"Bring forth the royal diadem,
And crown him Lord of All."

Catholics and Protestants alike, Christians of every name and nature, still cleave to the Divine Kingship and Lordship of Christ; and nothing is plainer than that Christianity in all its forms is a religion as completely based on the monarchical idea as is the most despotic government of the Old World. In fact, Old World government is simply reflected in Old World religion. The two are thoroughly harmonious—or have been till within the last hundred years. That is the reason why, in all the European monarchies, Christianity is the State-religion and the strongest support of the existing order of things. And that is the reason, also, why European liberals in politics are almost to a man disbelievers in the Christian religion.

What is the case in the New World? Here the republican idea is supreme in politics. The law here recognized is not the will of a monarch, but rather the decision of the public reason as expressed by the votes of the majority. No law can stand for a day, after the people believe it is intrinsically unreasonable or unjust. The whole frame-work of the American government rests on the law of natural reason. Imperfectly apprehended it doubtless is in many cases. Still, the dominant idea of American politics is that of natural reason and natural right. The government officials are simple servants, and so regarded; their will counts for absolutely nothing.

Yet this republican nation, so thoroughly imbued with the principle of natural reason as the supreme law in politics, still continue in a more or less earnest manner their nominal allegiance to Christianity, with its absolute spiritual despotism. The same man who is an ardent republican in politics, confessing no human will as his law, is yet often a most loyal monarchist in religion, accepting the will of Jesus as the law of his rightful King and Lord. He acts on one set of ideas in his public life, and on a contradictory set of ideas in his private life. The reason of this singular anomaly may be summed up in a single word—thoughtlessness. He bestows no vital thought on his religion. He thinks by proxy. He echoes his father's and grandfather's thought without inquiry. He has not begun yet to apply his thought to religion, but simply inherits it as he does the old home-stead.

But this state of things cannot last forever. The incongruity of American government and American religion is forcing itself on millions of minds. Freedom in either means freedom in both. The Sunday question, the Bible in schools question, the Christian Amendment question, are but outcroppings of this interior contradiction in American life. The nation is coming to be uneasily aware that it has got to adjust its government and its religion anew. The consciousness of this necessity will increase. There is a great practical absurdity to be got rid of—the absurdity of maintaining a despotic religion in a free country. The people are slowly awaking to the fact that a free State must have a free religion—that one as well as the other must rest on the great law of natural reason—that it is impossible to settle some very important practical questions, so long as the popular government and the popular religion are at sword's points on questions of fundamental principles. The Bible must either stay in or stay out of the schools; the Sunday must either be secularized or made a sacred day; the Constitution must either be kept secular or made Christian. Nor can questions like these be settled without coming to a distinct understanding whether the natural law of reason, or the arbitrary law of Christianity, shall govern men in casting their votes. The Christian religion points to one solution of these questions; reason points to another. And men soon learn to perceive, when called to act, that they cannot walk simultaneously in opposite directions. Contradictions in mere opinion are very apt to lie undetected in ordinary minds. But contradictions in action are soon perceived. From these facts it is clear that a conflict of ideas is imminent in this country, if not already here. Our strictly secular form of government, recognizing no law but that of reason, is now beginning to work as never before in modifying men's thoughts about religion. They are rapidly coming to the conclusion that it is necessary to have a Free Religion in a Free State.

There is a profound need at this time of a NEW ABOLITIONISM. The slavery of despotism will still continue over human souls, though the chains have fallen in fragments from their limbs. The Anti-Slavery Society has nobly accomplished its work, and gone into the past crowned with the benedictions of the age. This Association is neither more nor less than a new Anti-Slavery Society—an organized protest against the soul-bondage that still survives to darken the pathway of mankind. If it comprehends its own historic mission, its trumpet will give no uncertain sound. It will blow a blast, not noisy or obstreperous, but yet so clear and piercing that it shall penetrate to the farthest confines of the land, and (a more illustrious exploit) into the deaf ears of popular indifference and ecclesiastical stupidity. Natural reason instead of arbitrary will, whether in the administration of States or the conduct of private lives—in a word, Free Religion in a Free State—that is our battle-cry; and all but the dead will leap up at the sound of it, electrified with a new purpose and a new insight into the grandeur of America's destiny.

A HINDU MISSIONARY TO THE CHRISTIANS OF ENGLAND.

[By M. D. Conway in the Cincinnati Commercial.]

LONDON, November 16.

It is just as I apprehended. I remember well, when writing to you about the Hindus in London, some time ago, prognosticating Pundits coming over here to teach the English people something about religion. Bishop Colenso told me in conversation of the astonishment he felt when, far away among the Zulus, an African responded to his Bible narratives by asking him if he was quite sure of his facts. I have heard, too, Professor Newman relate how he was taken aback, when, as a missionary, he had expounded the plan of salvation to a carpenter in Damascus, the man merely expressed his surprise that a people so clever as the English—especially in cutlery—should have such an odious religion. But, if great Oxonian scholars like these, sent out to convert Pagans, have been converted by them, what security has the Most Holy Faith, if these ingenious Orientalists shall carry the war out of Africa, and out of India, and—to mix the metaphor a little—beard the lion in his lair?

In this apprehension paradoxical? It certainly is. Nevertheless, the paradoxical often comes to pass. On Sunday last a large and highly respectable audience assembled at a hall in an aristocratic part of the city to hear a discourse from A. Jayram, Row of Mysore, India, on the seemingly innocent subject of "Education in India." Mr. Jayram (Row is a title equivalent to Prince) holds the high position of Tutor to his Highness the Maharajah of Mysore, and is now on leave of absence to visit Europe for the purpose of studying science and perfecting himself in the Continental languages. He is already able to use English not only clearly, but felicitously. I have learned from himself various interesting facts of his personal history, which I had perhaps better mention at once, lest, in the perusal of the singular address I am to report, the question of this gentleman's competency to express such important opinions should arise in any mind. Mr. Jayram was born at Anantapur, District of Bellary, Madras Presidency, in 1843. He belongs to the highest or priestly caste, which he will lose by his journey to Europe, as he will be unwilling to go through the superstitious forms and sacrifices which, with considerable money in addition, are necessary to purify a Brahmin of high caste who has been tainted by leaving his country for even the smallest time. Through a series of domestic misfortunes he was thrown at an early age upon the hands of his grandparents, who took no care of his education, and it was only in his seventeenth year that he began to study in the Provincial school at Bellary. He next matriculated at Madras University, and became Assistant Master in the Bellary school. He then passed successive tests and became F. A. and B. A. of Madras University. In 1869 he was appointed to the position he now holds. It will be seen, therefore, that Mr. Jayram is in a position to speak upon educational questions in India. An additional interest was felt in the announcement of his discourse because he is the first Brahmin from the Madras Presidency who has ever come here. We have only had the roseate accounts of the missionaries themselves from that region hitherto. I may add that Mr. Jayram has no connection whatever with the Brahmo-Somaj movement, which high-caste Hindus seem to look upon as a sort of Oriental Methodism.

When Mr. Jayram came to St. George's Hall, on Sunday, he was accompanied by a company of students from University College, where he is studying the sciences. His attendance was significant; it was made up of a number of students well known for their deep-dyed rationalism, and at their head was the handsome face of Professor Hunter, a law-lecturer in the same University, which said face has become a kind of banner for any intellectual radicalism going. When the young Prince took his stand behind the footlights, with the sufficiently oriental drop curtain behind him, there was a visible sensation at the novelty and picturesqueness of the whole thing. He has a very handsome and highly intellectual countenance; a perfectly smooth and bright chocolate complexion—his face of elegance, as if carved out of some fine sandal-wood; and a large, soft and winning black eye. He wore the dark velvet fez of his caste, a black coat buttoned up to his throat, which, parting at the waist, disclosed a curious dark purple apron, which descended below the knee. He is a much handsomer man than Babu Chunder Sen, who was justly admired; and his address showed him to have much more scholarship and intellectual power than the Brahmo leader, whose force was in his large heart, and the warmth of his enthusiasm.

In a quiet, clear voice, the Prince began by alluding to the two systems of education which England had introduced into India, represented by the secular and the missionary schools. With much grace, he thanked those who established the latter. So long as the English were making sacrifices under the belief that the poor Pagans are lost unless brought to embrace their faith, they (the Pagans) can not be too grateful. But, said the speaker, sooner or later, the truth must out, that Christianity has no successes in India, and is never likely to have, notwithstanding the working for over a century of a vast machinery especially designed for that purpose. Among the millions in India, the number of educated natives who have become Christians would fall short of the number of one's fingers. The only persons whom the missionaries claim are the Pariahs, not one of whom, as is notorious, could possibly state any point of divergence between the abandoned and the embraced faith. This class constituted the first of four divisions into which the speaker divided the people of India. They are entirely without education, either English or Hindu. The second division are of those who possess an elementary knowledge of English and a tolerable acquaintance with Hindu literature. The third are those who have by their own efforts secured some knowledge of the sciences also. The fourth are the learned men of Hindu philosophy and Hindu science, "such as they may be." The first class has a religion of the senses—Fetichism. Christianity, "with its medley of dogmas and theories, half fetichistic, half metaphysical," is far less attractive to this class than their own idols and oracles. The missionary rarely masters the vernaculars enough to make himself intelligible. If he does that, the apostle scarcely forgets the whiteness of his skin, or his comfortable bungalow, enough to mingle with the dark masses toiling under a tropical sun. The missionary's five hundred a year is enough for splendor in India, which he is fond of. He generally has a phaeton. His hebdomadal harangues fall on careless ears. From the ignorant class the only converts to Christianity are those induced by poverty to accept a faith which always provides at least a livelihood for every Christian native. "Can you wonder, then, if a few unfortunate or unprincipled Hindus take shelter under a religion which does not compel the idle to work?" But this course is fatal. "The contempt and disgust which these dissipated and ignorant wretches engender in every mind are in themselves sufficient to bar the progress of Christianity among the better classes."

With regard to the division of those who have a tolerable English education, the speaker said one of its first results was to make them skeptical concerning their own native religion; and if he challenges his own country's beliefs, he is tenfold more severe in his criticisms upon the alien faith—Christianity. "He pounces upon the thousand metaphysical difficulties which surround its doctrines, and which have puzzled the ingenuity of its highest philosophers, without being brought one step nearer to a satisfactory solution. Nay, he rips open its very fundamental conceptions, chasing to light every inconsistency, inconsequence, and self-contradiction lurking or enshrined therein, while their helpless champion, trembling with horror, but unable to stop this work of vandalism, wonders if Heaven's wrath has spent its lightnings. Meantime, the havoc proceeds. The shattered images crowd on every side—the different attributes of the Godhead, so irreconcilable with one another, and, therefore, incapable of predication together; the strange doctrine of prayer (so useless if God be just—so impious, so blasphemous, if implying his openness to adulation); the simultaneous belief in Predestination and Free Will, an impossibility, both of thought and fact; inherited sin, and salvation through the sufferings of an innocent God—a conception allied to the wild caprice of blood-thirstiness—and, to crown all, the working of this very salvation through centuries of human suffering, without bringing the greater part of mankind any salvation at all—this scheme, which even human pride might blush to own."

The rest of this passage, uttered in a ringing but never loud voice—spoken with eloquence of dark eye-flashes as well as of tones—had its close drowned in a spontaneous outburst of applause from the intent English listeners. Could I believe my ears? Can an assembly in this Christian land applaud such sentiments? I looked around to see if the company was made up of the Bradlaughites, the Secularist regulars, the South Place Radicals, the Voyseyites, with most of whose faces I am tolerably familiar. Not at all; they were as average an audience as one could find listening to symphonies at St. James' any fashionable evening. When the Hindu found now that he had the sympathy of his audience with him, he unsheathed himself even more freely, and brought before us a droll picture of the missionary dodging the learned Pundit who ever goeth to and fro seeking a missionary to devour argumentatively, a process—as missionaries go—not very difficult. He mentioned it as a remarkable fact that no instance has ever been known of a missionary even attempting to convert a learned man or Pundit. Such he piously gives a wide berth when he can. But unluckily he is not always successful. "The Hindu, in whose constitution a love of controversy is constitutional, seeks our show of contest, flies into a passion or gets entangled in platitudes which bring upon him mischievous merriment." But the final and deadly blow which the always feeble prospects of Christianity in India have received was stated by the orator to be the discovery which the prevalence of the English language and literature has forced upon India, that this religion—whose only forcible argument was that it was the religion of "English intelligence and civilization"—this religion recommended to India is "exposed to a life and death struggle from the rapid advances of science in the very land of its highest triumphs, in the very cradle of its early successes!" If Christianity has little chance with the very ignorant in India, if it only rouses the antagonism of the tolerably educated, what chance has it of conquering the convictions of the scientific, or the prejudices of the Hindu Literati? The speaker showed that these—his last two divisions of the people of India—were profoundly engaged in translating their old faith into a rational substance, and converting their gods into ideas, and could abhor nothing more than another and fresh importation of miracles and legends. He gave a most interesting account of the present phase of Hindu Philosophy. "The state of society in India, in respect of beliefs and principles of action, is, and has been for a long time, very much like that of Greece and Rome in their palmy days. In those countries the beliefs of the higher and educated classes—of their philosophers—had little in common with the superstitions of their less advanced countrymen. If they tolerate them, it was because they were prudent, or because they knew that all men could not be philosophers. Something like this obtains in Hindu society. If the Pundits encourage the popular beliefs, it is from policy. Their philosophy is too subtle for the masses, nor is their interest—being priests—to popularize it. The Brahmin has two schools—the esoteric and the exoteric—the one full of ceremonies, prayers, penances; the other of discussions of the phenomena of the universe." All of which was taken to be such a fair transcript of the Broad Church in England that the audience was amused, and some one in my vicinity whispered out: "Stanley all over."

The speaker, unconscious of the parallel he had suggested, proceeded to claim that no system of philosophy is more "logical and profound" than the Vedantic, which, he affirmed, very nearly approaches that of Mill and Bain in fulfilling the requirements of modern scientific thought. Buddhism—an offshoot of Hindu philosophy—was simply an unsuccessful effort to reconcile its rational character with the emotional cravings of the masses. The original philosophy which Buddha thus compromises with popular ignorance is much purer. This would appear to all but for the misleading fact that the Vedantic Philosophy expresses itself by a mystical phraseology. This is not, the speaker submitted, a demerit, for it amounted simply to using the actual language which represented Hindu habits of thought. "The Berkeleyan Idealism, which reduces both the objective and subjective worlds to permanent possibilities of sensation—undoubtedly the most logical theory yet conceived by the European intellect—has been distinctly enforced in the Hindu philosophy for centuries. When it enunciates that the internal and external worlds are varying manifestations of the one principle 'Maya,' the mere dabbler in Hindu philosophy thinks only of the goddess so named, and pronounces the doctrine absurd; the patient student finds that, though the ordinary meaning of 'Maya' is Illusion, the real signification of it is Phenomena (in contradistinction to Noumena). The modern theory of Evolution is shadowed in the Vedantic resolution of all into one unconscious, self-existent and ever-varying principle—matter with its many aspects and properties. From this flows its conception of necessity, which means only that constancy and uniformity of Nature which European science affirms. The popular Hindu notion of three deities is merely a flesh-and-blood personification of the three fundamental generalizations of the philosophy of force. Brahma is the constructive, Siva the destructive, Vishnu the restorative—Force."

The speaker went on to say that the awakened mind of India was eagerly inquiring. "Only, like the magic gate in the Arabian Nights, the portals of our hidden energies open to no sound but that of wisdom." Christianity has not yet uttered that charmed word. He criticises the secular schools of the government and its universities severely, because they not only do not teach what India needs and craves above all, Science, but have no man there capable of teaching any science. He showed that India held treasures which would make deficits impossible if her people had been instructed in Science. With regard especially to Social Science, it was an unrecognized, unknown phrase among English instructors in India, at the very moment when the most momentous social changes were going on. Simply as matter for thought, India, with communities representing every variety of social organization and custom from the remotest past, furnishes the greatest field for the study of Social Science on earth; but it can be explained only through Hindu scholars, for it is possible for Englishmen to come close enough to the people or their customs to study them. England should therefore take the greatest care to teach the physical and social sciences through her educational institutions in India—a course now not even begun. Nay, said the speaker, so carefully are we given a religion we will not have, while real knowledge is kept from us, that from the provincial schoolmaster up to the Director of Public Instruction a sublime ignorance reigns concerning the highest achievements of modern science and research.

I cannot describe to you the impression made upon the large and intelligent audience which listened to this eloquent Indian scholar. When he was through, a large company of literary and other citizens gathered around him, and assured him that they profoundly sympathized with the just demands of India which he had enunciated. That India shall have fewer missionaries and more science has indeed been, for some time, the theory and theme of a large and cultivated class; for it is recognized that it is the missionaries that dread science and keep it out of the schools there. It is very plain, however, that with A. Jayram, Row, and several dozen clever Hindus of high rank and influence, thirstily imbibing from the universities of England the principles of Darwin, Huxley, Mill, and Spencer, India will not have her path to positive knowledge piously impeded much longer.

THE NEW HEROES.—We listen to essays upon the total depravity of human nature, and discourse thereon ourselves as if we believed nineteen-twentieths of our fellow-beings wholly selfish; yet there never arises a great emergency, demanding heroic self-sacrifice, that some good soul does not step forward to respond. The steamer "City of Houston" came near going to total wreck through the stupidity of a drunken captain and a demoralized crew, when, after her gallant mate was disabled, two officers of the United States navy and a detachment of seamen took the ship in charge, and bravely and calmly labored until they brought her safely into port. When we get the details of the loss of the "Lodona," we shall find that her noble captain, Hovey, did his duty to the last. And last Saturday evening, five miles out of Boston, happened the most dreadful railroad disaster New England has known since the catastrophe at Norwalk. A second after the terrible crash, in the midst of one of the cars, a cool, steady voice cried out, "The danger is all over—don't be afraid." Another gentleman, finding that his wife was unwounded, though greatly shocked, laid her fainting on the grass, leaving his little daughter to watch her, and went desperately to work to get out the wounded. And a brave brakeman, working at his post to stop the train, was caught between the platform of the baggage and the first passenger car. He sat upon one platform with his thighs crushed and bound by the other, and a terribly bruised hand. There he sat patiently conversing, but not murmuring, for nearly an hour, till a jack-screw was brought to lift the platform and relieve him. Mr. Story, a passenger, found lying upon the grass a woman with her right arm badly crushed between the elbow and the shoulder, and her face badly scalded, and suffering intense pain. He asked her what he could do for her. She replied: "There are others hurt a great deal worse than I am. Go and attend to them. I can bear it." She was taken to a house and laid upon the floor with a bundle of bloody clothes for a pillow. She would not let the doctor attend to her injuries until the others had been cared for. Another is thus added to the countless list of those who have paralleled Sir Philip Sidney's famous deed. All about us are men and women, not knowing it themselves, capable of suffering and dying for the good of others, or in the simple performance of duty. The world is better than it seems.—Hartford Courant.

Some preachers complain that, although they preach doctrinal sermons often and long, and explain the dogmas, tenets and points of belief of their particular sect with great lucidity and particularity, they still fail to make some of their warmest and staunchest adherents of their creed understand it in its scope and relations. For example: "Father Ballou," said an elderly Universalist, who had for twenty years delightedly attended on his preaching, "in your sermon to-day, I got the idea that you thought everybody was to be saved,—them Orthodox fellows as well as we Universalists. Did ye mean that?" "Certainly," was the reply; "that's our leading principle." "Well," was the disappointed rejoinder, "it never struck me so before; I thought it was the Universalists alone who were to be saved,—them who had some faith in the doctrine."—Boston Advertiser.

The High, Low, and Broad Church parties of England are designated as "Attitudinarians," "Platitudinarians" and "Latitudinarians."

Coolness, and absence of heat and haste, indicate fine qualities. A gentleman makes no noise, a lady is serene.—R. W. Emerson.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I know of no one in town except myself who feels any active sympathy with the movement represented by THE INDEX. One extreme materialist who believes the world will finally outgrow all religion as defined still thinks the Radical agitation (at present) ill-timed, dangerous, and tending to anarchy. I try to convince him that the spread of true ideas and a high standard of education are the best guarantee against civil disorder, and instance Prussia in proof; but don't make much headway in persuading him. Perhaps you have touched the topic in some of the numbers I have not received and justified your work in a political as well as religious point of view. I intend to give my friend your speech at Cincinnati, which has a close bearing on the point, and probably your essays on Christianity and Modern Civilization would throw some light on it. P. S. I wish to qualify the statement about the apathy of this place in regard to the Free Religious movement. The Spiritualists who read THE INDEX appreciate it, but give the first place to their own cause."

"Enclosed I send you my subscription for THE INDEX of 1871. I request a copy of that 'Annual Report,' &c. I do not make this request in the spirit of a Shylock, or because I want the 'worth of my money,' but because I cannot afford to lose an iota of your mind or that of your associates. My most respected friend — and I have clubbed together for the Examiner; it is powerful—powerful. But there is an error—the 'inside' policy. The Examiner says much in its defence; it sees the need of it. Your position—'outside'—needs none. Nevertheless, you have a fault—you are all dove—no serpent at all. Lime alone will not make mortar, neither can sand alone."

"The two last numbers of THE INDEX have failed to reach me for some unknown cause. If the fault is in your office, please forward them to me—if not, let me know and I'll remit pay for them. I miss them very much, and desire not to miss a number."

"I feel the loss of a paper like a wound. Your enterprise is a great one. The stupendous machinery of the world's religion, I hope, is doomed, and will be superseded by Free Religion, the only kind worth any thing."

CANDOR.

[For The Index.]

As leaf by leaf the opening rose
Its inmost heart lays bare,
Till countless charms in sweet repose
Lie all collected there;
So Candor doth the heart unfold,
Each grace and virtue show,
Until the charms are all unrolled
In one transcendent glow.

When thought is written on the brow,
Undimmed by fear or art;
When form and feature burn and glow
With sparkles from the heart;
When all the garden of the soul
Blooms blushing on the face,
Not heaven unveiled could ere unroll
A charm of equal grace.

'Tis like the clear, translucent waves
That glitter in the light,
As if the gems of ocean caves
Came flashing on the sight;
'Tis like a star within a cloud
Of softly curling haze,
Diffusing through its misty veil
The glory of its rays.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL $100,000.

SHARES EACH $100.

The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 26, 1872. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

ANOTHER GAIN.

With great pleasure we welcome Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, of Jamaica Plain, Mass., among our editorial contributors, and offer to our readers this morning the first article from her pen. Mrs. Cheney enjoys a high reputation at the East as the efficient and devoted Secretary of the New England Freedmen's Aid Commission for seven or eight years past; as one of the Directors of the Horticultural School for Women, and of the Woman's Hospital, Boston; as one of the Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association; as an active member of the Woman's Club and Radical Club of Boston, and as a lady who in many ways has rendered most valuable assistance in reforms looking to the elevation of woman, especially in those seeking for her larger opportunities of labor and culture. Such an accession to our list of contributors will give new strength to THE INDEX, not only because of her well-known ability and universally respected character, but also because the free religious reform can never make rapid headway in the world till woman has given to it her heart and her help. Free Religion is the protest of humanity against the subtle interior tyranny of false and crippling ideas, no less than against the power of great organized tyrannies in church and state; and this protest can never have its full natural effect until woman as well as man joins in it. Hence we welcome Mrs. Cheney's kind co-operation with especial gratitude, as foreshadowing the day when women shall perceive that the ideas of Free Religion are the real though unrecognized root of the woman movement itself.

THE COMING EMPIRE OF SCIENCE.

A LETTER FROM MR. DARWIN.

In our issue of June 24, of the present year, the following passage was contained in an editorial article:—

"Only yesterday we received from one of the greatest scientific men of England, whose name is famous throughout the entire civilized world, a private letter of which the following was the closing sentence:—'I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I believe that I agree to every word.'"

We are now authorized by kind permission of the writer to say that the above extract is from a letter written by Mr. Charles Darwin. In another letter dated Nov. 16, Mr. Darwin says:—

"I have read again 'Truths for the Times,' and abide by my words as strictly true. If you still think fit to publish them, you had better perhaps omit 'I believe,' and add 'almost' to 'every word,' so that it will run—'and I agree to almost every word.' The points on which I doubtfully differ are unimportant; but it is better to be accurate. I should be much obliged if you would somehow prefer to word as an extract from a letter not originally intended for publication, or to this effect; as it seems to be somewhat conceited or arrogant otherwise to express my assent."

Our readers would be deeply interested by statements made in this and other previous letters of Mr. Darwin's, if we felt justified in publishing them; but we have no right to do this. What we do publish is deliberately authorized by him. We believe that every intelligent person who has read the "Truths for the Times" will see a far more important reason than egotism for the publication of this passage. While fully sensible of the great honor of such approval in our attempt to state the most important truth, and while filled with admiration of the spirit which leads Mr. Darwin, notwithstanding the almost universal reluctance of scientific men to express openly their religious convictions, thus to lend the weight of his great influence to strengthen the unpopular cause of free religious thought, we have a much better reason for quoting his words than any personal one whatever.

For several years it has been a deep and ever-deepening conviction of ours, publicly expressed in various ways, that there is but one method of attaining intellectual truth, whether in the domain of philosophy or religion; and that this is the SCIENTIFIC METHOD, enlarged and more widely applied than in what is called physical science, and yet substantially the same. This conviction was the key-note of our lecture in Horticultural Hall, Boston, on the "Intuition and Scientific Schools of Free Religion." It is the key-note of all our work in THE INDEX, so far as this concerns the discovery or establishment of truth. It will be the key-note of other work that we hope to do before we die. And we believe it will be the key-note of all the genuine science, philosophy, and religion of the future of mankind.

It was with this conviction that we wrote the "Fifty Affirmations" and the "Modern Principles," which together constitute the "Truths for the Times." These statements were conscientiously prepared—most laboriously thought out and most carefully worded. That they can be greatly improved, we do not for a moment doubt. But that they express a general view of the religious problems of the age which is destined finally to supersede all other views, we entertain no more doubt. And we have submitted them (we trust with entire modesty) to the attentive, dispassionate study of all earnest and reflective minds.

Now the "Truths for the Times" is an effort to bring the truest science and the truest religion of the age into absolute harmony and mutual understanding. The supposed conflict between science and religion is superficial and unreal, when both are properly conceived. To show the common ground beneath the two, and to remove the rubbish that now hides it from men's eyes, has been the object of our endeavor. And what is specially to be noted is that this endeavor has been made from the side of religion. It is an honest effort on the part of modern religion to meet modern science as a friend—not to patch up a temporary and miserable compromise or truce between secret foes, but to establish an everlasting peace on the basis of absolute justice between open friends.

The importance, then, of Mr. Darwin's deliberate approval of the "Truths for the Times" lies in the fact that he is a man who by his genius has done more in this age to extend the bounds of science than any other man living, and who may therefore be regarded as fairly representing the probable opinion of scientific men in the future. Modern science is coming to a fair understanding with modern religion. That, we trust and believe, is the real meaning of his words. Although questions of the greatest consequence remain still open to investigation, discussion, and earnest thought, the most progressive science and the most progressive religion of the times are agreeing upon common principles and working for harmonious ends—science ruling supreme in the world of intellect, and religion ruling supreme in the world of morals. If we are correct in considering Mr. Darwin in this case rather as representing a general tendency of modern scientific thought than as expressing merely an individual opinion, then it is very plain that all personal considerations should be lost sight of, and that his approval of what we consider the most extreme statement yet made of the free religious movement should be taken as a very significant, indeed the most significant, sign of the times. It is because we believe this that we have thought it important to publish the extract which he has so generously and nobly allowed us to use—and not because we have sought to secure for the "Truths for the Times" the "endorsement" of venerated authorities, or any recommendation whatever beyond that of the intrinsic truth of the statement itself. Our conviction of this truth can neither be strengthened by the assent nor weakened by the dissent of others; and we have desired to give Mr. Darwin's words to the public for the simple purpose of showing that the tendencies of Modern Science and Free Religion are in the same direction.

We do not wish to lay any more stress on Mr. Darwin's opinions than they are justly entitled to, or to insinuate that they are shared by all scientific men. With a modesty which is the weightiest of rebukes to the arrogant spirit of theology, he considers his own opinions as of little value on such subjects; and it is indisputable that scientific men are at present divided in sentiment concerning them. But there is confessedly no scientific thinker now living whose thought has so profoundly affected the future of science, or done so much to direct the course of its development. Human investigation has taken a new start from his deep, original thought; and the impulse he has given to all future researches into the origin, nature and destiny of man will never be exhausted while knowledge is loved and sought. Law, and not miracle, is the key with which he would unlock these and all other problems; and to him belongs the rare glory of having discredited miracle even in the disguise which had deceived the very eyes of science herself—of having revealed the unity and harmony of Nature's processes in a region which had been still sacred to superstition. Faith in law has been the inspiration of his wonderful scientific career; and it has made him one of the greatest prophets of the new era.

It is surely, then, no trivial fact that such a man can recognize his own thought in the ground-principles of Free Religion. From the side of science and the side of religion comes alike the same deep affirmation of law as supreme; and in this common faith is the old feud between them healed. The superstitions which religion has intruded among men's thoughts must be utterly cast out from the sphere of human belief; and yet science must reverence her in her legitimate domain. The moss-grown errors of Christianity are crumbling away; science must clear the ground for the temple of truth, sparing no rubbish of idolatry that impedes or embarrasses her work; yet religion will survive in human hearts as the living endeavor to realize in life the resplendent ideal that illumines the inmost recesses of the soul—as the strong, brave effort of imperfect man to rise higher and higher into the sunshine of the universal and absolute Best. The supreme empire of science over the intellect, like that of religion over the will, is drawing nearer day by day; and both together, in their unjarred harmony, will make their advent as the one indissoluble empire of the Divine in Man.

This week we begin again to use printed labels, giving both the address of our subscribers and the date to which they have paid. Please examine these labels and notify us at once of any error in either respect. Those in arrears will be now informed of the fact; and we hope that all will be disposed to renew. If a few copies should be sent out this week without labels, the labels will be used next week.

A new Taylor Book Press has been purchased by our printers in order to publish THE INDEX hereafter in the best style. It is intended to improve the quality of the paper used in printing the next volume; but the size cannot be increased with advantage until additional stock of the Association is taken. When the liberal public are satisfied that the money already on hand is wisely used, they will doubtless increase it. This is right. We hope to show results that will justify confidence, and prove to our friends the magnificent opportunity before them of now building up a paper unique of its kind and unequalled in its liberalizing influence on public opinion.

DEFINITIONS OF RELIGION.

At a late meeting of the Radical Club in Boston, Mr. Weiss gave a definition of Religion which seemed to be very much misunderstood by those who heard it.

He said:—"Religion is the recognition of the facts of the Universe." Rev. Dr. Hedge, while praising the general character of the essay, objected to this and other statements as materialistic. It seems to me an entirely unfounded charge.

Mr. Weiss' definition may not be exhaustive. Religion is so broad a word, and is full of such subtle meaning and relations, that it is not easy to "define," or even, as Mr. Alcott says, "confine" it. But this is a very suggestive sentence, and one which puts Religion in an entirely worthy attitude, redeeming it from all the possibilities of narrowness and littleness which have been charged upon it.

We do not understand Mr. Weiss as meaning by the "facts of the Universe" merely that a stone falls to the ground by the power of gravitation, or that acids and alkalis unite by chemical attraction. The facts which Religion recognizes are of spirit as well as of matter. The fact of existence—that we are, that spirit is, that God is; the fact of Creation—that all is not as it once was, but that there has been evolution, growth, progress; the facts of Indestructibility, of Eternity, of Infinity,—all these are facts of the Universe, which the scientific mind perceives, and uses after its method and for its purposes. The religious mind recognizes these same facts, and relates them to the human consciousness—another fact—and deduces from them various truths of Religion.

The great Bibles of the World begin by taking cognizance of these facts. The Hebrew scripture announces the fact of existence in the eternal I AM; and its first pages are devoted to an account of the process of Creation in the form in which some Hebrew genius conceived it.

Then there are many puzzling facts in the Universe, very hard to understand,—the existence of evil, for instance, the great amount of suffering in the world, the tremendous convulsions of nature, disease and premature death, accident, destruction by flood and fire.

Has not Religion always busied itself with these facts, and tried to explain them? But it must first recognize them; and Mr. Weiss' word is a happy one, for it must recognize them with friendliness and willingness, and examine them frankly and fearlessly, before it can get into right relation with them.

There has been the short-coming of all narrow and dogmatic religions. They do not recognize the facts, but they try to force the facts to suit themselves. Ecclesiastical History does not investigate the origin of the world as a universal fact; it insists that Religion requires you to believe a special account of it. It does not look for the meaning of suffering and death in the constitution of the Universe; it declares it to be an arbitrary creation as a punishment for an imaginary offence.

Materialism is just as narrow when it insists that every thing shall be proved to the senses alone, and rejects all the facts of the consciousness and all the spiritual history of man.

This definition of Religion, of course, puts Religion perfectly in harmony with Science. Is it not strange that we should have had so much objection to that union from those who profess to worship the Bible, where the knowledge of God is so often spoken of as the highest attainment? And what is the knowledge of God but Religious Science?

When we recognize the "facts of the Universe," we shall have taken a great step towards faith and trust in its Creator; and is not that the first great principle of Religion? Until we do that, it seems to me all true relation to the Universe or its Creator is impossible.

E. D. C.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS CONVENTIONS.

We shall have something to say in an article next week on the recent Conventions held by the Free Religious Association in Detroit and Syracuse. This week we simply take a few extracts from the reports of the daily papers in those cities, which will give some indication of what was said and done. The newspapers generally were very liberal in the space given to the reports of the meetings and pretty fair in their accounts.

At the opening session of the Detroit Convention Mr. Frothingham took occasion to refer and reply to some of the criticisms and objections that are made to the Free Religious Association. Among these he alluded to the charge recently made by Rev. Mr. Mayo, of Cincinnati, that the principles of free religion tend to social demoralization. On this point the Detroit Tribune reports him as follows:—

When Luther, he said, went out of the Roman Church, it was asserted that society and morality would be destroyed; that the Lutherans could not succeed, and after a brief trial they would return to the mother church. The result is far different than was claimed by the anti-Lutherans. For strict morality and all that goes to make social bonds secure, the people have to turn to Protestant countries. Protestantism said the same thing of Unitarianism, and when this religious faith was established, the Protestants said it could not survive. To-day it is the boast of Unitarianism that rectitude of life is one of their cardinal principles. The Free Religionists claim that they can go still further than the Unitarians, and still inculcate a love of all that is honorable and pure and noble, and still improve the social structure of the world. Society is perpetually renovating itself, and Free Religion will continue to renovate society.

The essay read by Mr. Abbot on Friday morning upon the subject of "Free Religion in a Free State," which was reported at length in the Post of Detroit, will probably be given entire to the readers of THE INDEX. No extracts therefore are made from it here. From the report of the evening essay by the Secretary of the Association we take the following extracts. The subject was "The Doctrine of Divine Providence in the Light of the Western Conflagrations:—"

One of the cardinal doctrines of religion is that there is a wise, benignant Supreme Providence working in the affairs of men. One of the cardinal doctrines of reason and science is that natural law prevails in all the affairs of men. The great problem of modern religious thought is how to reconcile these two cardinal beliefs. Fresh interest is often awakened in problems of thought by the actual events through which we are called to pass; and particularly has this been the case during the past two months, since the awful conflagrations that destroyed a large part of Chicago, and burned over a vast extent of forest in Michigan and Wisconsin. The religious press and pulpit, as usual, interpreted these calamities as a special visitation of Almighty Power for the punishment of people's sins. But the secular press and common sense of thinking people have been looking for some more rational as well as beneficent interpretation of the sad events.

There is, indeed, no possible chance for a special providence when we have once really grasped the idea of a universal providence. The universal either excludes or swallows up the special. So much of the idea of a special providence as supposes each individual soul to be cared for with paternal interest, is included and covered by the idea of a universal providence. But so much of the idea of a special providence as supposes God to act by a more immediate exercise of will in some events of our lives than others, and sometimes to set aside His general methods and laws of action in order to secure to some soul a particular object, not to be obtained through them, is contradicted and excluded by the idea of universal providence. Could we by the utterance of a few words of prayer avert poverty, disease, hardship, pain, misfortune and death from our doors, the half of human virtue and greatness would vanish.

And the great, heartrending catastrophes that come with such fearful misery and destruction—what are they but constant appeals to all that is keenest in man's intelligence, and all that is deepest and most noble in his moral nature, to exert himself to the utmost to learn nature's secret and to invent some way to put himself into harmonious relation with it?

God cannot interpose to save humanity from the results of broken sanitary laws, for the very purpose of those afflicting results is to emphasize the importance of the laws; but He has given to man the power to intervene in his own behalf by imparting to him the humane heart that can assuage suffering, and the inventive intellect that can prevent it.

In the Convention at Syracuse, Rev. N. M. Mann, of Rochester, read a paper on "The Relation of Religion to the State," which the Syracuse Standard reported in part as follows:—

This conception of the Free State is the legitimate product of free thought; the principles of Free Religion are laid in its very foundations. The desire to establish a commonwealth whose constitution should ignore all distinctions of rank, race and religion, and set men together on the basis of a common brotherhood could only have been born in hearts already stirred by the apprehension of a universal religious sentiment which makes the whole human race equal in the great family of God. The idea of a Free State is heretical according to all the ancient canons of authority.

The ideal Republic has many striking points of similarity to a Free Church. Surely the Free State is the counterpart of the Free Church, whose doors are thrown open to all comers—inner doors as well as outer—so that the ends of the earth may gather and no conscience be in abeyance. The two institutions are the outcome of one sentiment. It is a wonder to me how so many fail to see that, by devotion to the principles of republican liberty, they are committing themselves to the very principles of Free Religion. The same hands that are opening the very Eden of the earth, free to all comers, have no business to be closing the gates of heaven against any who may be knocking there.

The exclusive spirit of the Church in this country, represented by its leaders, is at war with the inclusive spirit of the State; a condition of things that cannot permanently endure. Either the Republic must narrow its basis and openly discriminate against heretics and heathens, so ceasing to be a free country, or the Church, to keep itself from being forsaken by intelligent religious people, must cease from such discrimination. The guardians of orthodoxy see this, and the movement has been some time on foot to get the State to so commit itself to the Christian religion as virtually to cut off all other religionists from citizenship. They demand an exclusive dogma in the Constitution.

The exclusive party will not have strength to reverse our theory of government so far as to alienate any man on account of his creed, if the good sense of the country, which is always liberal, is awake to the peril and stands by the traditions of the fathers. But though we keep our theory good, our practice has been, and is now, very defective; as witness our treatment of the African and Asiatic. One other prominent defect in our practice, chargeable directly to the anti-American spirit of the churches, must be noticed here. Our Free School-system is the legitimate offspring of the Free State; conceived on the same principles of absolute impartiality. Child of the State, it belongs to the State; but the churches want to kidnap this child, then cut it in pieces, and distribute the parts among themselves. Bishop McQuade complains that the public schools are administered on the theory of liberal religion. So indeed they must be, or they cannot live. On the same theory the government is administered, or should be.

We demand that there shall be here, along with the name, the reality of liberty; that the laws of the land shall not be constructed with reference to a class or a sect, or be made the vehicles of doctrines peculiar to the Christian or any other religion, but rest upon established principles of justice and right; that government shall order and prohibit from high ground of morality, on which good and wise men can agree, and not from any theological assumptions. The simple announcement serves to stir up strife. I must think that the conception of a free State is typical of that religion which it will have; and as I believe that conception will at length be realized in America, I believe a religion will grow up here to correspond with it.

Another topic discussed at Syracuse was

"The Relation of Free Religion to Specific Religions." This was opened by Rev. E. C. Towne, and the following extracts from the Standard's report give a partial hint of his address:—

Free Religion, he considered, was not the antagonist of faith; it had sympathy with all religions. They thought most and said most of Christianity because out of that they had come. He had not given up all Christianity; they stood sympathetic to all the sons of God; to all the noble and antique faiths, but nearest to Christianity. He sympathized as much with Arabs and Hindus as with his brethren on the platform. They were full of faith in being profoundly sympathetic with all religions.

What people most truly meant in their religions was what they were in sympathy with; the truth in Zoroaster, in Buddhism, in savage faith, was what they wanted to get at. All the great religions had their radicalism, which was simply an outburst of reason and an effort to make harmony with the highest good of man. In the interior of Arabia a gentleman had said they received religion as a matter of free communion with the Absolute.

The humane in the highest degrees was religious. He had one or two friends, infidels, whom he loved to quote as being this type of perfect man. One was enveloped in profound reverence; easily moved to tears, he had no positive faith in God. He so overflowed with tenderness akin to reverence that he had said he could think of circumstances under which he must pray; if an old woman should ask him to pray on her death-bed, he supposed he should do so. The other perfect friend was an infidel who had nobly aided a Catholic Orphan Asylum. There was a religious value to social action, without using the term religious in the usual sense. He had been in prayer meetings and in other places, and yet never was he in such a profoundly religious place as in a radical club in Boston. The highest reverence, frankness and sociality prevailed. That was a true church, as Ruskin has said, which took a man by the hand helpfully. Free Religion was simply a recognition of the brother with such cover as God had thrown over him; it might be more or it might be less. The humane sentiment was a profound theistic verity. We were learning in our treatment of criminals to make our justice humane; so must it be in theology; thus they reduced hell to a place where people were taught to do right; in heaven above the work of moral reform would still go on; humility was about all that was necessary in theology; this would build no cruel scheme for slaughtering souls in the world to come. They did not disbelieve the Religion which the religions of the world had sought to express. The man who was pure in heart built on humanity; it was simply his duty to give his hand helpfully to humanity. By loving one another were they most truly religious. Under all the churches of the world it always seemed to him there was a church of the right hand of fellowship.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Since my last report my work has been done mainly in Cincinnati, Toledo, and Clyde, all in your State. The latter place was wholly new soil for our seed, but not in the least unpromising. The weather was inhospitable; but both my lectures were well attended and heard with profound interest. The new Hall was freely opened by the Spiritualists for the first; and the Universalist meeting-house for the other.

Mrs. Cowles and Mrs. Morse tendered me most cordial hospitality; and Mr. and Mrs. Whipple also showed me every needed attention; to me all the more welcome on account of the terrible severity of the weather, of which I harvested a great deal too much for my health or comfort.

Twenty years ago, I could lecture every evening and sometimes two or three times on Sunday, from first of September till last of March, defying all winds, all weathers. But I can not endure exposure to winter as in earlier life.

In the autumn of 1840, my friend Stephen S. Foster, now of Worcester, Massachusetts, commenced our warfare on the old slave system of the Southern States. We travelled together much of the time for a year or two, not always too well clothed for New England winters; not always able to "take two coats apiece," if even we had plurality of more interior garments. And, although unlike the disciples whom Jesus sent forth "without any shoes, or money in their purses," we had but precious little money, and our shoes were sometimes sadly demoralized. But we remembered that much of this world's best moral and religious teaching and preaching used to be done by men who went on foot and went bare-footed also.

We have travelled a whole afternoon by stage and on foot, arriving just in time for our meetings; then spoken each an hour; then walked on to the nearest hotel, called up a snoring hostler from his bunk in the bar-room, been shown by him to a cheerless chamber, gone supperless, sometimes cold, to bed, risen early in the morning, breakfasted on crackers and raisins at the nearest grocery, expending not a dime each, and then pushed forward to our next engagement, by such conveyance as offered. Sometimes a friend would set us on our way; now and then we could catch a stage, when we had money to pay fare, and frequently we went on foot, sometimes even in severe cold and storm.

We were young and strong then; and besides were terribly in earnest. We had abandoned the Congregational ministry, when we certainly had fair prospect of success in it (Mr. Foster pre-eminently); and we had no idea of throwing our lives and work away in our new calling.

To us, Slavery seemed the National sin, shame and crime; and we determined to see its overthrow, or die in the struggle. We were often most fiercely mobbed. More than once, I think, our meetings were broken up, or nearly so, four times in one week—the mob not unfrequently traceable directly to the pulpits of the places where they occurred, and always to some "respectable" source!

And that was the way much of New England was made acquainted with the anti-slavery cause, and with its obligations and responsibilities toward the enslaved.

You need not wonder then, Mr. Editor, that the winters have now for me some terrors. I have dared them through more than thirty of their returns, most of the time in New England; but now, as last year, have retired to "winter quarters" in Salem, Ohio, as you suggested in THE INDEX lately.

Coming up to Toledo and Clyde from the milder climate of Cincinnati, and almost at the very moment when the fierce Northwest wind descended with uncommon fury, the wonder was that I survived. It was indeed as "with the skin of my teeth." But I am recovering now; and hope to give good account of myself in the ensuing months. No place better appreciates good, earnest work than Salem.

And I certainly have every reason to rejoice at the results of my autumn campaign in Michigan, Indiana, Illinois and Ohio. And one of the most cheering indications was that, wherever I went, I was invited to repeat my visit and remain longer if possible.

There are earnest men and women in almost every considerable town in the West, who wait impatiently for just the gospel which you proclaim in THE INDEX, and which I also endeavor to carry in my humbler way into whatsoever place I enter.

P. P.

* Gail Hamilton, by her article "Per Contra" in the N. Y. Independent, shows that she has been reading certain lectures on Christian Propagandism. She does not quite like to admit it, but it is clear she wants to know more about missions than the "Reports" state. She has evidently a half-suspicion that the whole truth has not been told. That this suspicion is not baseless, she will learn from an article on our third page to-day. She says:—

I wish that the advocates and agents of missionary societies would place the debit side before us so fully and faithfully that there should be nothing left for the Westminster Review to say. If logic and history and political science and commercial facts and vital statistics be all against us, and we must work by faith alone, still let us know it. I would not insinuate that there is any attempt at concealment, but do we not naturally dwell too much on one side? Are the readers of missionary journals and the attendants upon missionary meetings so well informed on what has or has not been done that the intelligent opponent cannot truly say anything bad or depressing about missions of which they are not already aware? Does the great parish of the American Board know how little has been done as accurately as it knows how much has been done?

Gail must be more cautious, or somebody will accuse her of "prevarication."

LIGHT IN DARKNESS.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

You and I call ourselves "Free Religionists." What do you mean by "Religion?" You wish truth to prevail; but what is truth? One of your correspondents writes:—"If there is no God, no immortality, no soul, I wish to know it." Now you say—"If this is the only life, we should still live up to our highest ideal"—why? If this is the be-all and the end-all—why?

I am poor. I long to enjoy the highest pleasures of which our human nature is capable; but I cannot, because I have not the money which would enable me to enjoy these things. By living dishonestly, by living a lie, I can make many people happier and at the same time fill my pockets with gold. Now why should I not do this? It seems to me sometimes that, if you do doubt a future life, you are more inconsistent than—than—well, than the "Liberal Christians." Why should I suffer for the right, if this is the end?

This life is dark to me; but I hope there is another, in which (since I never expect to meet you in this) I may meet you and Ruskin and Shelley and many more gods of my idolatry.

I do not know that this letter is worth your noticing, but should be glad if you thought it worthy of a reply.

ONE OF YOUR FRIENDS.

[It is contrary to our rules to notice anonymous communications; but something urges us to make an exception in this case.]

In THE INDEX for 1870, Nos. 1-7, 14, 15, and 25, answers will be found to the inquiries concerning "religion" and "truth." We must refer to the essays in those numbers and in the present number.

The beautiful sonnet by Matthew Arnold which was printed in No. 101 gives the answer of a noble spirit to our unknown correspondent's question—"Why?" Why should we love the good rather than the evil? Why should this love burn clear and indestructible, though every star of hope went out in night? Is it not because the good is intrinsically lovely, and wins our hearts by reason of its simple loveliness? We cannot otherwise explain the great passion for virtue that lifts every true man and true woman above all calculation of reward. Of this, at least, we may be sure—until we have learned to love virtue so dearly that we forget the very thought of reward, whether here or hereafter, we do not love it at all. Come pain or pleasure, come life or death, come immortality or eternal forgetfulness, the soul that throbs with the one passion which alone dignifies human life will turn to virtue with inextinguishable desire and unconquerable fidelity.

Not less wistfully than our correspondent do we look towards the veiled future—not less delightedly should we hail the knowledge that the virtue which so fascinates us in the great masters of human living is to be "a joy forever." One thought reconciles us to our ignorance—that ignorance of so boundless a reward of virtue is necessary to make virtue disinterested, and therefore possible. If the Infinite Benignity of which we dream would really fit the soul for an endless career, it must be in ignorance of a too dazzling future. In this necessity we acquiesce. The thought sweetens uncertainty, and steals the sting from a question that eludes all answer to-day.—Ed.]

A WORD OF ENCOURAGEMENT.

PALMYRA, Mo., Nov. 9, 1871.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

THE INDEX pleases me very much. Its manly fight against dogmatism and superstition, its earnest, noble effort to show the perfect harmony of all God's works, and its integrity to truth, must give it place among the leading mediums of circulating advanced thought, and make it almost indispensable to all liberal thinkers.

It has aided me very much in logically presenting some points of my belief to a few Orthodox Ministers of my acquaintance, with whom I have frequent discussions. I find these men more liberal after reading from Theodore Parker. One of them has just completed Voysey's lecture on the Bible, and concedes it to be quite unanswerable.

I am engaged in commerce, and being "non-sectarian," I have to respond to the calls of every denomination for aid in support of their ministers. Upon reflection, I have determined, instead of aiding to disseminate theories so repugnant to me, to use the funds in the distribution of liberal thought, hoping others may be stimulated to use their own reason rather than depend upon the prevailing superstition for their religion.

By such advances as I was licensed to make on the subject, I was surprised to discover many of the best informed minds of our city protesting against the inconsistency of Orthodoxy, and in belief (if not in practice) full-fledged Rationalists. I am fully convinced that any city or town has among its abler minds many who are wholly persuaded of the essential correctness of THE INDEX position.

A few have not the courage to make the sacrifice to their business which an avowal of their belief would occasion. But when they realize through THE INDEX and the liberal press generally that their number is legion, they will no longer keep their mouths closed from revealing the truth; and the great reformation to Free Religion will have accelerated progress. I exult in the success of raising the $50,000, and say, let us make it $100,000. Please place my name for one share. I wish I could make it two. I enclose some funds which please distribute as per note below. With congratulations, and well wishes, I am a friend.

SAMUEL C. EASTMAN.

A PLAN.

ASHFIELD, MASS., Dec. 15, 1871.

MR. EDITOR:—

I propose a plan for increasing your list of subscribers. That is, let each subscriber send you twenty-five cents as a New Year's present, and you, being generous, will send them as many numbers of THE INDEX as that will pay for, with the understanding that they are to be given away to liberal friends. I think that a better way to circulate THE INDEX than any other; for any liberal friend has only to see it to be induced to take it. It may be considered a New Year's present from now till February.

Yours &c.,

LEONARD CHURCH.

[We should be obliged to any of our subscribers who should feel inclined to distribute copies of THE INDEX in this or any other way. Even a list of names would be of use. Mr. Church has our sincere thanks for his friendly plan.—Ed.]

THE SPENCERIAN DOCTRINE OF INTUITION.

EDITOR OF INDEX:—

You have so little room to spare for correspondents that I feel it is like trespassing on your space to send you such hasty thoughts as my limited leisure will allow; yet I would like to exchange views on some subjects that your contributors introduce occasionally.

I have lately been reading Darwin and Spencer. Spencer's "Psychology" has especially suggested new trains of thought, demonstrating satisfactorily, I think, important facts in human nature. His wonderfully clear analysis of Instinct, Intuition, and Reason is extremely interesting, and will serve to explain such facts as E. L. Crane mentions in his letter to THE INDEX of 27th August last. Intuition is shown to be nothing more nor less than an inherited tendency of thought and feeling. Sometimes such intuitions are good, elevating, noble—being the result of well-developed high sentiments in the ancestors; sometimes they are mean, degrading and full of the animal—equally the result of like development in the parent. Here, there is an intuitive tendency to steal and a cunning ability to deceive; there, there is an intuitive sense of justice and an open candor which scorns all deception. All experiences in thought and feeling having a tendency to become habitual and automatic, habits gradually become "organized," and are transmitted to the succeeding generation, where they appear as hereditary intuitions. This is true not only of man, but of the animal kingdom generally, as Darwin has abundantly shown. The pointer's "intuitions" lead him, when first taken out to the prairie, to hunt up and point at game, while the greyhound's "intuitions" lead him to hunt up and run down game.

It is true that our "intuitions" are generally correct from the fact that those "organized experiences" which have originated them are mostly founded on the adaptation of the individual to his surroundings; but when the mode of life has been such as to bring into active exercise the lower feelings, the resulting intuitions are of like grade. A servile cringing spirit has become intuitive to certain people of Europe from their long continuance in abject dependence on the wealthy classes.

But I would more especially notice some logical inferences which inevitably follow from Spencer's psychological premises:—

1. Sin, or wrong-doing, is an unavoidable characteristic of a progressively developed being. As long as it is a fact that the animal instincts and experiences are developed before the intellectual and moral, so long will there be a want of self-control, a want of "adjustment of the individual to his surroundings," and the consequent suffering or "punishment" for his sins. The punishment necessarily follows the wrong, and is one of the most important means of developing the yet dormant higher sentiments and intellect.

2. Self-control is shown to be one of the most important attributes, in order to check the lower instincts until the superior motives or sentiments become habitual, and the experiences of a higher life become "organized" and finally as strongly hereditary as the animal tendencies. Without self-control there could be generated no permanent higher sentiments or "intuitions."

3. "Prayer" is shown to be one of the most powerful aids to self-control to some, not because help is given in answer to such prayer by an outside Power, or by a benevolent God, but because the act of prayer diverts the train of thought and feeling into new channels, and the power of the temptation is broken by the nervous force taking a different direction,—on the same principle that a distressed child is most easily pacified by directing his attention to some new object that will interest and please.

4. It is shown that there is no such thing as "freedom of the will." This old question is very clearly and satisfactorily disposed of.

5. It is shown that strong emotion disturbs the intellectual balance, so that the judgment is not reliable when the feelings are strongly excited; in other words, the false sentiment, superstitious religion, for instance, cannot be cured by placing before it a higher form of religion. The very juxtaposition of such will only excite antagonist feeling and render a clear intellectual judgment impossible. As Tyndall expresses it—"When feeling escapes from behind the intellect, where it is a useful urging force, and places itself in front of the intellect, it is liable to produce glamour and all manner of delusions." But let a Darwin trace back the origin of man to an inferior type of animal, or a Lyell trace back the earth's history of herself, demonstrating her age to be 6,000,000, rather than 6,000 years, and there will be no need of saying anything about Adam's fall or the Mosaic history, about total depravity or a vicarious atonement.

Following Spencer's analysis of thought, feeling and reason, there will be demonstrated the fact that we cannot think what thoughts we please, we cannot feel what sentiments we please, nor reason what logic we please; but all these are subject to certain inflexible laws of experiences—our own experiences or those of our ancestors. All we can do is to find out the laws of Nature, and bring ourselves in adjustment to them.

But I am trespassing too much.

KANSAS, Nov., 1871.

BIBLICAL INSPIRATION.

MR. EDITOR.—A late number of THE INDEX contains an article by Rev. R. H. Howard, in which he attempts to explain away the contradictions of the Bible. He appears to be one of those who have lost the faculty of the perception of truth in their efforts to harmonize impossibilities. The belief that the Bible was divinely inspired originated in an age of credulity, when the laws of evidence and their application were unknown; and it cannot be maintained in the light of modern science. It is a question of fact, to be determined on the evidence; and men who wrote twenty or thirty years ago did not possess the knowledge now available. The scholar who, examining the Bible with the aid of modern criticism and Comparative Theology, finds in its books unmistakable and overwhelming proof of its human origin, is not the enemy of the Bible any more than of the Vedas or the Zend-Avesta, which millions of the human race revere as divine revelations. Water was naturally supposed to be one of the elements, until science proved it a union of two gases; then the belief had to be given up. This belief in the Bible as the Word of God is a superstition pure and simple, as was the belief in witchcraft, or the belief that insanity was caused by evil spirits, both of which came down to a comparatively recent period, and were defended by the clergy to the last. All religious phenomena are capable of a scientific explanation. The origin of every belief may be discovered and its development traced. The infatuation regarding the Bible is related to that of the heathen who venerates an idol as his God. In this case men bind up some Hebrew and Greek books, and call them the "Word of God." Mr. Voysey's views are shared by a large party in the Anglican Church, and many of the educated clergy in this country.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,

With offices at 90 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 22 Vesey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

- O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
- THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of Newport, R. I.
- WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
- RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
- J. L. BLAKE, of Boston, Mass.
- WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
- MRS. E. D. CHENEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
- Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.

Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

INDEX TRACTS

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY. The first edition of this admirable Tract has been entirely exhausted; but a new edition will be ready in a week or two.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution?" Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single Copies Ten Cents; Six Copies Fifty Cents; Twelve Copies One Dollar.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, is a scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One dollar.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, is a singularly felicitous treatment of a subject that interests everybody. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

Also, The Bible Argument Against Woman Stated and Answered from a Bible Standpoint, a pungent pamphlet by A. J. GROVER, is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

TOLEDO OFFICE NO. 90, ST. CLAIR ST.
NEW YORK OFFICE NO. 22, VESEY ST.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

LOCAL AGENTS.

HENRY H. RICHARDSON & Co., 22 Vesey St., New York.

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1871, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains Essays, by John Weiss, on "THE ATTITUDE OF SCIENCE TO RELIGION;" by O. B. Frothingham, on "SUPERSTITION AND DOGMATISM;" and by Wm. J. Potter, on "THE NATURAL GENESIS OF CHRISTIANITY;" also a report of addresses by Dr. Bartol, T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Prof. Denton, A. M. Powell, and others, together with other proceedings of the meeting. Price 35 cents; in packages of five or more 25 cents each.

The ANNUAL REPORTS for 1868, 1869, and 1870 (at 25 cents each), Rev. Samuel Johnson's Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), Rev. W. H. Channing's Essay on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA" (20 cents), Col. T. W. Higginson's Essay on "THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS" (30 cents), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. Potter (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained as above.

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion without Superstition

First Series, No. 1 to 20.

Second Series, Just Published—

21. Fanaticism: how displayed by well-meaning people in their judgment and action respecting religion in others.
22. Let your Faith honor God, not calumniate Him: reject all testimony that speaks ill of God.
23. Who Wrote It? a proper and needful inquiry when an unreasonable claim is urged on the ground that "it is written."
24. Periodical Prayer: ask when you want to ask; thank when you want to thank; be honest in prayer.
25. Hear the other Side: seek an intelligent faith, instead of blindly following ignorance and prejudice.
26. Man's Duty to God: above all things do not neglect it; but take care, too, not to be misled in regard to it.
27. Penny-wise, Pound-foolish: to claim divine inspiration for unworthy imputation on the divine character.
28. A Touchstone for false Teachers: God certainly gave reason and conscience to be our guides.
29. Justice and Love vs. Mercy: God's actual method better than the supposed "plan of salvation."
30. Prepared to Die: an unveiling of some clerical false pretences.
31. "Even as Others?" showing a point of resemblance between the "evangelicals" and those believers whom they stigmatize as "unbelievers."
32. Do Men need Salvation? a look towards God directly, not through the dark-stained church-windows.
33. Unchangeable: will God ever refuse to welcome the repenting and returning sinner?
34. Lost Sinners: men sometimes lose their children: did God ever lose, can he lose, his children?
35. Times and Seasons: two false notions considered; one about Friday, one about Sunday.
36. Do they really believe it? cases where Orthodoxy follows tradition in opposition to Scripture.
37. The Boston Revival and its Leader: methods of operation of Rev. A. B. Earle, professional revivalist.
38. He Rejects the Bible: a false charge refuted, and the opposing truth clearly shown.

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

SCIENTIFIC MATERIALISM.

[From "Fragments of Science for Unscientific People," by Prof. John Tyndall, pp. 109-122, Amer. Ed.]

The celebrated Fichte, in his lectures on the "Vocation of the Scholar," insisted on a culture which should not be one-sided, but all-sided. The scholar's intellect was to expand spherically, and not in a single direction only. In one direction, however, Fichte required that the scholar should apply himself directly to Nature, become a creator of knowledge, and thus repay by original labors of his own the immense debt he owed to the labors of others. It was these which enabled him to supplement the knowledge derived from his own researches, so as to render his culture round and not one-sided.

As regards science, Fichte's idea is to some extent illustrated by the constitution and the labors of the British Association. We have a body of men engaged in the pursuit of Natural Knowledge, but variously engaged. While sympathizing with each of its departments, and supplementing his culture by knowledge drawn from all of them, each student among us selects one subject for the exercise of his own original faculty—one line along which he may carry the light of his private intelligence a little way into the darkness by which all knowledge is surrounded. Thus the geologist deals with the rocks; the biologist with the conditions and phenomena of life; the astronomer with stellar masses and motions; the mathematician with the relations of space and number; the chemist pursues his atoms, while the physical investigator has his own large field in optical, thermal, electrical, acoustical, and other phenomena. The British Association, then, as a whole, faces physical Nature on all sides and pushes knowledge centrifugally outward, the sum of its labors constituting what Fichte might call the sphere of natural knowledge. In the meetings of the Association it is found necessary to resolve this sphere into its component parts, which take concrete form under the respective letters of our Sections.

This is the Mathematical and Physical Section. Mathematics and physics have been long accustomed to coalesce. For, no matter how subtle a natural phenomenon may be, whether we observe it in the region of sense, or follow it into that of imagination, it is in the long-run reducible to mechanical laws. But the mechanical data once guessed or given, mathematics become all-powerful as an instrument of deduction. The command of geometry over the relations of space, the far-reaching power which organized symbolic reasoning confers, are potent both as means of physical discovery, and of reaping the entire fruits of discovery. Indeed, without mathematics, expressed or implied, our knowledge of physical science would be friable in the extreme.

Side by side with the mathematical method we have the method of experiment. Here, from a starting point furnished by his own researches, or those of others, the investigator proceeds by combining intuition and verification. He ponders the knowledge he possesses and tries to push it further, he guesses and checks his guess, he conjectures and confirms or explodes his conjecture. These guesses and conjectures are by no means leaps in the dark; for knowledge once gained casts a faint light beyond its own immediate boundaries. There is no discovery so limited as not to illuminate something beyond itself. The force of intellectual penetration into this penumbral region which surrounds actual knowledge is not, as some seem to think, dependent upon method, but upon the genius of the investigator. There is, however, no genius so gifted as not to need control and verification. The profoundest minds know best that Nature's ways are not at all times their ways, and that the brightest flashes in the world of thought are incomplete until they have been proved to have their counterparts in the world of fact. Thus the vocation of the true experimentalist may be defined as the continued exercise of spiritual insight, and its incessant correction and realization. His experiments constitute a body, of which his purified intuitions are, as it were, the soul.

Partly through mathematical and partly through experimental research, physical science has of late years assumed a momentous position in the world. Both in a material and in an intellectual point of view it has produced, and is destined to produce, immense changes—vast social ameliorations, and vast alterations in the popular conception of the origin, rule, and governance of natural things. By science, in the physical world, miracles are wrought, while philosophy is forsaking its ancient metaphysical channels and pursuing others which have been opened or indicated by scientific research. This must become more and more the case as philosophical writers become more deeply imbued with the methods of science, better acquainted with the facts which scientific men have won, and with the great theories which they have elaborated.

If you look at the face of a watch, you see the hour and minute hands, and possibly also a second-hand, moving over the graduated dial. Why do these hands move? And why are their relative motions such as they are observed to be? These questions cannot be answered without opening the watch, mastering its various parts, and ascertaining their relationship to each other. When this is done, we find that the observed motion of the hands follows of necessity from the inner mechanism of the watch, when acted upon by the force invested in the spring.

The motion of the hands may be called a phenomenon of art, but the case is similar with the phenomenon of Nature. These also have their inner mechanism, and their store of force to set that mechanism going. The ultimate problem of physical science is to reveal this mechanism, discern this store, and to show that, from the combined action of both, the phenomena of which they constitute the basis must of necessity flow.

I thought an attempt to give you even a brief and sketchy illustration of the manner in which scientific thinkers regard this problem would not be uninteresting to you on the present occasion, more especially as it will give me occasion to say a word or two on the tendencies and limits of modern science; to point out the region which men of science claim as their own, and where it is mere waste of time to oppose their advance, and also to define, if possible, the bourne between this and that other region to which the questionings and yearnings of the scientific intellect are directed in vain.

But here your tolerance will be needed. It was the American Emerson, I think, who said that it is hardly possible to state any truth strongly without apparent injustice to some other truth. Truth is often of a dual character, taking the form of a magnet with two poles; and many of the differences which agitate the thinking part of mankind are to be traced to the exclusiveness with which partisan reasoners dwell upon one-half the duality in forgetfulness of the other. The proper course appears to be to state both halves strongly, and allow each its fair share in the formation of the resultant conviction. But this waiting for the statement of the two sides of a question implies patience. It implies a resolution to suppress indignation if the statement of the one side should clash with our convictions, and to suppress equally undue elation if the half-statement should happen to chime in with our views. It implies a determination to wait calmly for the statement of the whole, before we pronounce judgment in the form of either acquiescence or dissent.

This premised, and, I trust, accepted, let us enter upon our task. There have been writers who affirmed that the pyramids of Egypt were the production of Nature; and in his early youth Alexander von Humboldt wrote a learned essay with the express object of refuting this notion. We now regard the pyramids as the work of men's hands, aided probably by machinery of which no record remains. We picture to ourselves the swarming workers toiling at those vast erections, lifting the inert stones, and, guided by the volition, the skill, and possibly at times by the whip of the architect, placing them in their proper positions. The blocks in this case were moved and posited by a power external to themselves, and the final form of the pyramid expressed the thoughts of its human builders.

Let us pass from this illustration of constructive power to another of a different kind. When a solution of common salt is slowly evaporated, the water which holds the salt in solution disappears, but the salt itself remains behind. At a certain stage of concentration the salt can no longer retain the liquid form; its particles or molecules, as they are called, begin to deposit themselves as minute solids, so minute, indeed, as to defy all microscopic power. As evaporation continues, solidification goes on, and we finally obtain, through the clustering together of innumerable molecules, a finite crystalline mass of a definite form. What is this form? It sometimes seems a mimicry of the architecture of Egypt. We have little pyramids built by the salt, terrace above terrace from base to apex, forming a series of steps resembling those up which the Egyptian traveller is dragged by his guides. The human mind is as little disposed to look unquestioning at these pyramidal salt-crystals as to look at the pyramids of Egypt without inquiring whence they came. How, then, are those salt-pyramids built up?

Guided by analogy, you may, if you like, suppose that, swarming among the constituent molecules of the salt, there is an invisible population, controlled and coerced by some invisible master, and placing the atomic blocks in their positions. This, however, is not the scientific idea, nor do I think your good sense will accept it as a likely one. The scientific idea is that the molecules act upon each other without the intervention of slave labor; that they attract each other and repel each other at certain definite points, or poles, and in certain definite directions; and that the pyramidal form is the result of this play of attraction and repulsion. While, then, the blocks of Egypt were laid down by a power external to themselves, these molecular blocks of salt are self-posited, being fixed in their places by the forces with which they act upon each other.

I take common salt as an illustration because it is so familiar to us all; but any other crystalline substance would answer my purpose equally well. Everywhere, in fact, throughout inorganic Nature, we have this formative power, as Fichte would call it—this structural energy ready to come into play, and build the ultimate particles of matter into definite shapes. The ice of our winters and of our polar regions is its handiwork, and so equally are the quartz, felspar, and mica of our rocks. Our chalk-beds are for the most part composed of minute shells, which are also the product of structural energy; but behind the shell, as a whole, lies a more remote and subtle formative act. These shells are built up of little crystals of calc-spar, and to form these crystals the structural force had to deal with the intangible molecules of carbonate of lime. This tendency on the part of matter to organize itself, to grow into shape, to assume definite forms in obedience to the definite action of force, is, as I have said, all-pervading. It is in the ground on which you tread, in the water you drink, in the air you breathe. Incipient life, as it were, manifests itself throughout the whole of what we call inorganic Nature.

The forms of the minerals resulting from this play of polar forces are various, and exhibit different degrees of complexity. Men of science avail themselves of all possible means of exploring their molecular architecture. For this purpose they employ in turn, as agents of exploration, light, heat, magnetism, electricity, and sound. Polarized light is especially useful and powerful here. A beam of such light, when sent in among the molecules of a crystal, is acted on by them, and from this action we infer with more or less of clearness the manner in which the molecules are arranged. That differences, for example, exist between the inner structure of rock-salt and crystallized sugar or sugar-candy, is thus strikingly revealed. These actions often display themselves in chromatic phenomena of great splendor, the play of molecular force being so regulated as to remove some of the colored constituents of white light, and to leave others with increased intensity behind.

And now let us pass from what we are accustomed to regard as a dead mineral to a living grain of corn. When it is examined by polarized light, chromatic phenomena similar to those noticed in crystals are observed. And why? Because the architecture of the grain resembles the architecture of the crystal. In the grain also the molecules are set in definite positions, and in accordance with their arrangement they act upon the light. But what has built together the molecules of the corn? I have already said regarding crystalline architecture that you may, if you please, consider the atoms and molecules to be placed in position by a power external to themselves. The same hypothesis is open to you now. But if in the case of crystals you have rejected this notion of an external architect, I think you are bound to reject it now, and to conclude that the molecules of the corn are self-posit by the forces with which they act upon each other. It would be poor philosophy to invoke an external agent in the one case and to reject it in the other.

Instead of cutting our grain of corn into slices and subjecting it to the action of polarized light, let us place it in the earth and subject it to a certain degree of warmth. In other words, let the molecules, both of the corn and of the surrounding earth, be kept in that state of agitation which we call warmth. Under these circumstances, the grain and the substances which surround it interact, and a definite molecular architecture is the result. A bud is formed; this bud reaches the surface, where it is exposed to the sun's rays, which are also to be regarded as a kind of vibratory motion. And as the motion of common heat with which the grain and the substances surrounding it were first endowed, enabled the grain and these substances to exercise their attractions and repulsions, and thus to coalesce in definite forms, so the specific motion of the sun's rays now enables the green bud to feed upon the carbonic acid and the aqueous vapor of the air. The bud appropriates those constituents of both for which it has an elective attraction, and permits the other constituent to resume its place in the air. Thus the architecture is carried on. Forces are active at the root, forces are active in the blade; the matter of the earth and the matter of the atmosphere are drawn towards the root and blade, and the plant augments in size. We have in succession the bud, the stalk, the ear, the full corn in the ear; the cycle of molecular action being completed by the production of grains similar to that with which the process began.

Now there is nothing in this process which necessarily eludes the conceptive or imagining power of the purely human mind. An intellect the same in kind as our own would, if only sufficiently expanded, be able to follow the whole process from beginning to end. It would see every molecule placed in its position by the specific attractions and repulsions exerted between it and other molecules, the whole process and its consummation being an instance of the play of molecular force. Given the grain and its environment, the purely human intellect might, if sufficiently expanded, trace out a priori every step of the process of growth, and by the application of purely mechanical principles demonstrate that the cycle must end, as it is seen to end, in the reproduction of forms like that with which it began. A similar necessity rules here to that which rules the planets in their circuits round the sun.

You will notice that I am stating my truth strongly, as at the beginning we agreed that it should be stated. But I must go still further, and affirm that in the eye of science the animal body is just as much the product of molecular force as the stalk and ear of corn, or as the crystal of salt or sugar. Many of the parts of the body are obviously mechanical. Take the human heart, for example, with its system of valves, or take the exquisite mechanism of the eye or hand. Animal heat, moreover, is the same in kind as the heat of a fire, being produced by the same mechanical process. Animal motion, too, is as directly derived from the food of the animal, as the motion of Trevethyck's walking-engine from the fuel in its furnace. As regards matter, the animal body creates nothing; as regards force, it creates nothing. Which of you by taking thought can add one cubit to his stature? All that has been said, then, regarding the plant may be repeated with regard to the animal. Every particle that enters into the composition of a muscle, a nerve, or a bone, has been placed in its position by molecular force. And unless the existence of law in these matters be denied, and the element of caprice introduced, we must conclude that, given the relation of any molecule of the body to its environment, its position in the body might be determined mathematically. Our difficulty is not with the quality of the problem, but with its complexity; and this difficulty might be met by the simple expansion of the faculties which we now possess. Given this expansion, with the necessary molecular data, and the chick might be deduced as rigorously and as logically from the egg as the existence of Neptune from the disturbances of Uranus, or as conical refraction from the undulatory theory of light.

You see I am not mincing matters, but avowing nakedly what many scientific thinkers more or less distinctly believe. The formation of a crystal, a plant, or an animal, is in their eyes a purely mechanical problem, which differs from the problems of ordinary mechanics in the smallness of the masses and the complexity of the processes involved. Here you have one half of our dual truth; let us now glance at the other half. Associated with this wonderful mechanism of the animal body we have phenomena no less certain than those of physics, but between which and the mechanism we discern no necessary connection. A man, for example, can say, I feel, I think, I love; but how does consciousness infuse itself into the problem? The human brain is said to be the organ of thought and feeling; when we are hurt the brain feels it, when we ponder it is the brain that thinks, when our passions or affections are excited it is through the instrumentality of the brain. Let us endeavor to be a little more precise here. I hardly imagine there exists a profound scientific thinker, who has reflected upon the subject, unwilling to admit the extreme probability of the hypothesis that, for every fact of consciousness, whether in the domain of sense, of thought, or of emotion, a definite molecular condition of motion or structure is set up in the brain; or who would be disposed even to deny that, if the motion or structure be induced by internal causes instead of external, the effect on consciousness will be the same. Let any nerve, for example, be thrown by morbid action into the precise state of motion which would be communicated to it by the pulses of a heated body, surely that nerve will declare itself hot—the mind will accept the subjective intimation exactly as if it were objective. The retina may be excited by purely mechanical means. A blow on the eye causes a luminous flash, and the mere pressure of the finger on the external ball produces a star of light, which Newton compared to the circles on a peacock's tail. Disease makes people see visions and dream dreams; but, in all such cases, could we examine the organs implicated, we should, on philosophical grounds, expect to find them in that precise molecular condition which the real objects, if present, would superinduce.

The relation of physics to consciousness being thus invariable, it follows that, given the state of the brain, the corresponding thought or feeling might be inferred. But how inferred? It would be at bottom not a case of logical inference at all, but of empirical association. You may reply that many of the inferences of science are of this character—the inference for example, that an electric current of a given direction will deflect a magnetic needle in a definite way; but the cases differ in this, that the passage from the current to the needle, if not demonstrable, is thinkable, and that we entertain no doubt as to the final mechanical solution of the problem. But the passage from the physics of the brain to the corresponding facts of consciousness is unthinkable. Granted that a definite thought and a definite molecular action in the brain occur simultaneously; we do not possess the intellectual organ, nor apparently any rudiment of the organ, which would enable us to pass, by a process of reasoning, from the one to the other. They appear together, but we do not know why. Were our minds and senses so expanded, strengthened, and illuminated as to enable us to see and feel the very molecules of the brain; were we capable of following all their motions, all their groupings, all their electric discharges, if such there be; and were we intimately acquainted with the corresponding states of thought and feeling, we should be as far as ever from the solution of the problem. "How are these physical processes connected with the facts of consciousness?" The chasm between the two classes of phenomena would still remain intellectually impassable. Let the consciousness of love, for example, be associated with a right-handed spiral motion of the molecules of the brain, and the consciousness of hate with a left-handed spiral motion. We should then know, when we love, that the motion is in one direction, and when we hate that the motion is in the other; but "Why?" would remain as unanswerable as before.

In affirming that the growth of the body is mechanical, and thought, as exercised by us, has its correlative in the physics of the brain, I think the position of the "Materialist" is stated, as far as that position is a tenable one. I think the materialist will be able finally to maintain this position against all attacks; but I do not think, in the present condition of the human mind, that he can pass beyond this position. I do not think he is entitled to say that his molecular groupings and his molecular motions explain everything. In reality, they explain nothing. The utmost he can affirm is the association of two classes of phenomena, of whose real bond of union he is in absolute ignorance. The problem of the connection of the body and soul is as insoluble in its modern form as it was in the pre-scientific ages. Phosphorus is known to enter into the composition of the human brain, and a trenchant German writer has exclaimed, "Oline Phosphor, kein Gedanke." That may or may not be the case; but even if we know it to be the case, the knowledge would not lighten our darkness. On both sides of the zone here assigned to the materialist he is equally helpless. If you ask him whence is this "Matter" of which we have been discoursing, who or what divided it into molecules, who or what impressed upon them this necessity of running into organic forms, he has no answer. Science is mute in reply to these questions. But if the materialist is confounded and science rendered dumb, who else is prepared with a solution? To whom has this arm of the Lord been revealed? Let us lower our heads and acknowledge our ignorance, priest and philosopher, one and all.

Perhaps the mystery may resolve itself into knowledge at some future day. The process of things upon this earth has been one of amelioration. It is a long way from the Iguanodon and his contemporaries to the President and members of the British Association. And whether we regard the improvement from the scientific or from the theological point of view, as the result of progressive development, or as the result of successive exhibitions of creative energy, neither view entitles us to assume that man's present faculties end the series—that the process of amelioration stops at him. A time may therefore come when this ultra-scientific region by which we are now enfolded may offer itself to terrestrial, if not to human investigation. Two-thirds of the rays emitted by the sun fail to arouse in the eye the sense of vision. The rays exist, but the visual organ requisite for their translation into light does not exist. And so from this region of darkness and mystery which surrounds us, rays may now be darting which require but the development of the proper intellectual organs to translate them into knowledge as far surpassing ours as ours surpasses that of the wallowing reptiles, which once held possession of this planet. Meanwhile the mystery is not without its uses. It certainly may be made a power in the human soul; but it is a power which has feeling, not knowledge, for its base. It may be, and will be, and I hope is, turned to account, both in studying and strengthening the intellect, and in rescuing man from that littleness to which, in the struggle for existence, or for precedence in the world, he is continually prone.

MR. F. E. ABBOT'S LECTURE AT THE HOUSE OF CORRECTION.

To the Editor of the Detroit Tribune:

As Mr. F. E. Abbot, of Toledo, requested the Superintendent of the Detroit House of Correction to forward to him a report of the effect or influence of his last Saturday evening's discourse to the prisoners therein confined, I ask the use of your columns through which to convey to Mr. Abbot the information he desired as accurately as I am able.

The substance of that discourse was that it would pay to be good citizens, and that to attain to such goodness they (the prisoners) must not trust nor believe in Jesus, for He could not help them; neither must they believe in the Bible, for it is no better than any other book; nor must they believe in the church or in ministers; that if the Chaplain told them that they were totally depraved, they must not believe him; that they were just as good as anybody else; that if they were told that they were there as punishment for their sins, they must not believe that; that they were not wicked, but simply unfortunate; and if the Chaplain told them God was angry with them for their sins, they must not believe him, for God loved them just as dearly as he did anybody; and that if they would believe in themselves and in their fellow-men, and give heed to the voice within, they would be "all right."

These thoughts were diluted through a half hour's discourse.

Now, Mr. Abbot, as my facilities for learning the effect of your discourse are, possibly, greater than the Superintendent's, you will, I hope, be edified with the report I send you.

About the first man I heard from asked "if you were not the Abbot that edits the Tom Paine paper in Toledo?" Another said your talk about the Bible and ministers and Christians was just what they used to have in the dens where the gamblers, and thieves, and drunkards, and other blacklegs used to congregate. "Yes," said another, "and I used to talk just that way myself." Another said, "We did trust in ourselves, and we are here to pay for it. If we had trusted in Jesus, we should not have been here now." Another said, "Mr. Abbot asks us to trust in our fellow-men. Now, I would like to know if he locks his doors nights?" One man who has spent many nights in prayer and tears for the wickedness of his past life inquired, with eyes flashing like diamonds in the light, "What right, what business, had that man to come here and blaspheme the name of Jesus Christ to us poor prisoners, when it is by him that we are learning to escape the awful ruin our sins have brought upon us? I was lost to all good, and Jesus Christ has saved me, and I know I love Him. But that man does not know Him." Another wished to know if we could not have a lecture on free love next.

A German said, "It's not such a thing; it's all a lie; I does know it. When I was wicked, I could do all bad; could hate a man that do me hurt; then I could wish to kill him, and no voice in me tell me not, because I was wicked and because I was mad. But when I come here and learn about Jesus Christ, then I heard a voice in me tell me as I was big wicked. Then I feel sorry much and much days, and I cry; then I pray much, and tell Jesus I sorry much. Then Jesus He come and say I forgive you and love you; then my sins be gone away—I know they be gone and I love no more sin; I love God and Jesus Christ. Mr. Abbot, he does not know; he teach us bad. His religion cover all our sins. But Jesus Christ give us his love to cover all our sins, and we be no more ashamed. I not like he come here and abuse Jesus Christ and His Bible and His people."

I give you but a faint outline of the feeling and sentiments expressed, as the men arose in quick succession in the chapel service to give utterance to their views of your efforts to turn them away from the faith of the Son of God.

It will please you, perhaps, to know that, of the hundreds of impenitent thieves, drunkards, gamblers, and rogues in general, there were enough to give you hearty applause. These will find new stimulus for plying their old avocations from your assurance that God will love them none the less, sell themselves to whatever crimes they may!

Possibly you would know the Chaplain's views of your performance?

1. I deem it to have been in bad taste, to say the least, to take advantage of my inability to prevent you, to proclaim teachings so pernicious to the erring and sinful flock of my charge, without consulting me. Thus I would not have treated you.

2. Your talk had not even the merit of originality. It was the old story of scepticism, proven false by myriads of facts. Excuse me, but your ignorance of the things of God forcibly illustrates the truthfulness of the Bible, that "no man can see the face of the Holy Ghost; that the natural man receiveth not the things of God, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." Hence, He who is the joy of heaven and earth is to you "as a root out of dry ground."

It was a happy providence that sent that royal preacher, Capt. Kitwood, into the chapel in the midst of your discourse. Deeper into the cheerless depths of unbelief than you have yet descended has he been, and when, on Sunday, he narrated the appalling results in his own experience, and God's great grace in his happy deliverance, the people were greatly moved; many wept, and not a few, I trust, carried their sins and sorrows to the Saviour of sinners, receiving in exchange His salvation.

C. C. FOOTE,

Chaplain of Detroit House of Correction.

DETROIT, Dec. 12, 1871.

P. S. The National Prison Reform Congress of 1870 declared unanimously that "of all reformatory agencies religion is first in importance."

MR. ABBOT'S ADDRESS AS HEARD BY ANOTHER AUDITOR.

To the Editor of the Detroit Tribune:

In the Wednesday's edition of THE TRIBUNE the Rev. C. C. Foote, Chaplain of the House of Correction, gives what he calls "the substance of a discourse" delivered in that place by Mr. Abbot of Toledo, and undertakes to furnish Mr. Abbot with information which he desired, in reference to the effect of the discourse upon the prisoners. I also heard this address, and was so differently impressed both by the actual phraseology and the spirit of it, that Mr. Foote's letter seems to me a gross misrepresentation of facts. Permit me to give an account of what was said upon that occasion as nearly as I can recall it.

Mr. Abbot began by saying that he had not come there to preach to them—only to try to talk as one friend might to others—as he would if he could sit down by each one and offer them individually his sympathy and encouragement; that, having never before spoken under similar circumstances, he had been somewhat in doubt as to the manner in which he should address them, thinking perhaps they would have no interest in those ideas which he came to Detroit to advocate. But he had come to the conclusion, he said, that, if his religion was good for him in his own home, it was good for them there; if it was truth, it was as much for their benefit as for his, and that, therefore, he should tell them as plainly and directly as possible what his beliefs were.

He then went on to say that he presumed they were often told that they were great sinners—that they were totally depraved—that God's wrath rested upon them, and that, unless they accepted the sacrifice made by Christ, and had their sins washed away in His blood, a fearful and eternal punishment lay before them. My friends, said he, I do not believe one word of all this: You have undoubtedly done wrong—who has not? But I do not think that man ever lived who was totally depraved. I do not believe there is one of you here whose heart would not respond to a noble deed as quickly as mine would. Like all human beings, you are made up of good and evil. You have often listened to and followed evil to the neglect of good. But not the worst murderer that ever lived was wholly bad. I venture to say there is not a man here who has committed evil for its own sake. You have been sorely tempted, perhaps—or you have found life hard—or you have suffered and wanted to revenge your wrongs, and so have committed offences against society, and are here. You are not, on that account so much worse than all your fellow creatures. There are many persons in the enjoyment of their liberty who deserve to be here as you do, who will probably continue to escape punishment; yet I esteem it as your good fortune that you have been checked in your wrong-doing, and have been brought here and given this opportunity for reformation.

And I want to say that, if you are ever saved from evil, you must do it yourself. Christ's blood will not do it. The work must begin at the foundation, in the rooting out of those feelings and passions which lead you to commit sin. It must begin here, in the faithful discharge of duty, in cheerful submission to restraints whose object is to assist, not to punish you; in earnest resolution to become better men and better citizens. Consider who it is that suffers most for your offences. If you steal from a man, what does he lose? Money or valuables, the loss of which he can make good. What do you lose? Your honesty, your own self-respect, which, once gone, is hard to get back, your reputation, the esteem of your fellows; and very likely you do not escape detection and punishment. Do you not see that you injure yourselves more than anybody else? That every blow you strike recoils with added violence upon you? That it would pay you in every sense of the word to become good, law-abiding citizens?

And to this end three things are needed, faith in yourself, faith in humanity, faith in God. Don't get discouraged, and feel that it is of no use for you to try. Resolve to conquer in this struggle, to do your duty here, to come out and begin life anew with different and higher purposes. You have the power to do this, if you will but do it. Don't lose faith in your fellow beings. The world is full of good people who have only pity for you in their hearts, not contempt or distrust or dislike. I personally should be very glad to lend a helping hand and to speak an encouraging word to each one of you, as you go out again into the world. There are thousands who will do so just as gladly as I should, and who perhaps may have the power to help you a great deal more efficiently. And finally, have faith in God—not in an angry God under whose displeasure you have fallen and who must be appeased with a sacrifice, but in a good God, a loving God, a God who loves every one of you just as well as the greatest saint that ever lived. Have faith in Him, faith in humanity, faith in yourselves; give heed to the voice within, and all will be well.

This abstract, which is necessarily imperfect, does not, I think, do injustice to the spirit of Mr. Abbot's discourse, except as it conveys a very inadequate idea of the heartfelt interest in and sympathy for his audience, manifested by the speaker. I wished, as I listened, that those persons who complain that Free Religion brings only light, not warmth, with it, could have had this testimony to the vital and life-giving force which lies in a belief in and a love for humanity. Strip away all other creeds—leave these two only—"Love God with all thy heart and soul, and thy neighbor as thyself," and we have Christ's own testimony that this is the fulfilling of the law.

As to the effect of Mr. Abbot's address, I cannot speak with certainty. I do not, however, doubt Mr. Foote's testimony in relation to what occurred in chapel exercises. The logical effect of such ministrations as his is to beget the same spirit of intolerance and bigotry which he himself exhibits. But unless my eyes were greatly at fault, a large number of Mr. Abbot's audience (and not the least intelligent part of it) were deeply interested. They found in him a friend, a man who compassionated them, who appreciated their temptations, who had faith in them in spite of their crimes, and who would gladly encourage and assist them. And the hearty applause which followed the conclusion of the address only confirmed the opinion I had formed during its delivery. As to the effect produced upon others in the assembly, I can speak more positively. One of our party, as we were going out, said, "That was a sermon for all of us;" and we all felt it to be so.

Mr. Foote says, in conclusion, he thinks Mr. Abbot's enunciation of his beliefs under the existing circumstances was in bad taste and unfair towards him personally. Mr. Abbot was in no way responsible for this. Mr. Brockway, knowing Mr. Abbot's opinions perfectly well, and after having attended one at least of the meetings of the Association, invited him to address the prisoners. While waiting for the prisoners to assemble, Mr. Brockway said to Mr. Abbot, "You need not hesitate to say just what you think. Strike from the shoulder, hit as hard as you choose—I will be responsible." And I consider it strong testimony to Mr. Abbot's sincerity that he spoke as he did—not beating about the bush, or dealing in generalities, but uttering what he believes to be vital truths frankly, and without regard to the embarrassing position in which he was placed.

THE QUALITIES OF AN EDITOR.—A good editor cultivates a certain relation of friendliness and familiarity with his constituents. The army of unseen readers are to him what the congregation is to the preacher. They come to largely trust him, and he in turn is inspired by the thought of them. He studies their wants and tastes. His effort to please them is inspired by something higher than the mechanical necessity of his position. Now, to such a relation there should attach something of the sentiment which shapes friendly private intercourse. It does not preclude his calling attention, in the right way, to special features in the results of his work. Just so a hospitable host says to his guests: "Let me lead you to a place where you will find a good view;" or, "You may like to see my garden, or stables;" "Let me offer you this;" "Can I tempt you with so-and-so?" So we think an editor may on occasion become and modestly recommend his good things. But the tone of too many journalists is precisely that of a purse-proud fellow who stands radiating with self-compacency among his possessions and magnifies them to all who will listen: "Ever see a finer horse than that? There isn't his like in the State;" "You won't beat these greenhouses in a hurry;" "Take some fish—that fish cost me five dollars;" and so on.—Christian Union.

THE DECORUM OF DISHONESTY.—If you have a quick perception, you would be surprised to see how many "good stories" turn upon this political corruption; as witness this, in a religious paper, which means to be good and only good. It merely terms it "offended dignity," and runs thus:—

In a time of high political excitement in a certain State, a colored minister was supposed to have such influence with his flock, that it was needful to secure him for one party. He was "approached," as the term is, and finally the "question" was asked, how much money would be necessary to secure his vote and influence? With an air of offended dignity, brother—replied;

"Now, gemmen, as a regular awdained minister—dis ting has gone jes as far as my conscience will 'low; but, gemmen, my son will call round to see you in de morning."

Now in plain English, aside from the fun, here is a man, a Christian man and minister, or a hypocrite, who can be bought and sold politically; who is ashamed to own it, but not to do it, and who demoralizes his son by making him partaker in his deeds, and the story is set before us—to laugh at.—N. Y. Observer.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I want to cast ten cents worth of bread upon the waters. Please send a copy of THE INDEX of Feb. 18, 1871, to — also a copy to — Mich. I prefer this number because of Mr. Potter's address, and also for the general mildness of its tone, better for new beginners than the strong meat to be found in most of them. I am so very poor that I am actually excusable for borrowing your paper from my brother, instead of subscribing for it. I have been almost helpless for years. Nothing short of helplessness would justify me in borrowing instead of subscribing. I hope this ten cents will not be lost, for it is very large in my eye. If it pays for more than two papers, please send the remainder to me."

"The people—even liberals—here are terribly afraid of being called 'Infidels.' I have more faith in scientific developments, such as Darwin's 'Descent of Man,' than any other means for educating the people up to free religion. If the intellect is developed in the direction of mental science, geology, astronomy, and physiology, the sentiments will be necessarily modified accordingly."

"I have only been a subscriber for a year, but during that time I have received more new ideas and hints from THE INDEX than all the preaching I ever heard. I go West on Monday next, and if I should get permanently settled, I will again order THE INDEX."

"Your way of dealing with old traditional beliefs meets my approbation; and in fact all free thinkers who become acquainted with the contents of your paper are well pleased with the manner in which you handle old fogies."

IN LIMINE.

BY HELEN BARRON BOSTWICH.

I am coming, Mother Nature,—
I, thy hungry, homesick creature.
In thy lone, shy coverts hide me;
Heal me, soothe me, rouse me, chide me;
With thy awsome voices thrill me;
With thy crooning murmurs still me;
Grant thy blessing, sweet my Mother,
Since for me Earth holds no other.

Keep your coolness, moist green places;
Hoard your heats, O sandy spaces;
Mountains, bare your dizzy verges;
Lash your rocks, ye pitiless surges;
Cull me out no careful measure—
Pains of thine have taste of pleasure;
Fill me brimming cups, O Nature,
Feed me full, thy hungry creature.

Couch me soft in ferny closes,
Sweet of thyme-flowers and wild roses;
Spread for me thy ample faring,
Corn and milk, and fruits unsparing;
Let the chiming waters woo me,
Breezes fan me, birds sing to me,
Swift rains drench me, winds affright me,
Sultry heats of noon oppress me,
Great rock-shadows stretch to bless me.

Lift green arches, gates of Faery,
Ere my feet have grown too weary;
Of thy breast-milk, Mother Nature,
Feed me full, thy hungry creature.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.

The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 26, 1872. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

THE BOSTON FREE RELIGIOUS LECTURES OF 1872.

AN IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT.

The course of lectures delivered each winter for three years past in Horticultural Hall, Boston, by the most prominent representatives of free religious thought in America, will be repeated this year. No course of lectures on radical religion has ever attracted so much attention as this, or been so widely reported. The great New York dailies have each year sent special reporters to take abstracts of the lectures, and these or similar reports have been published all over the country. In short, this course embodies the ripest and most carefully matured thought of the ablest and most distinguished advocates of religious radicalism who are now before the American public; and they really address an audience numbering hundreds of thousands.

Through the kind assistance of Mr. R. P. Hallowell, one of the Committee of the Free Religious Association under whose auspices the course will be conducted, we are now authorized to announce that, by a special arrangement, all these lectures will be published exclusively in THE INDEX, as soon after delivery as possible, in regular series. At present writing we are unable to announce the names and subjects, but shall do so very soon. The reports given in the papers have always been very incomplete, and have therefore failed to convey an adequate idea of what was said; and we congratulate the liberal public that now they will be able to read the lectures entire in the columns of THE INDEX. The course will continue nearly three months; and we shall publish the lectures immediately on receipt of the manuscripts. We consider this the most important literary announcement of the season, so far as the liberal public are concerned; and no one who desires to be acquainted with the freshest and most vigorous thought of the times, as uttered in this representative course, will fail to subscribe at once for THE INDEX. These lectures will be nowhere else published in full; and they alone will be worth many times the cost of a year's subscription.

Now, then, is the time for every true friend of THE INDEX to urge its claims upon liberal acquaintances and neighbors. This is the last number of our second volume; and with no better announcement could we begin the third. It ought at once to double our circulation, which has been steadily and rapidly gaining of late; and with a little effort on the part of friends, this result could easily be secured. With hearty thanks for past help, and cheerful anticipations for the future, we say good-by to the Old Year, and welcome to the New.

Friendly editors will confer a great obligation by mentioning the substance of the above announcement in their papers.

AUTHORITY IN SCIENCE AND IN RELIGION.

Among our "Communications" this week will be found one from Rev. Francis T. Washburn, a well-known and able contributor to Old and New, the Religious Magazine and Monthly Review, and other Unitarian publications. It is a very courteous and manly defence of the Unitarian position, and as such entitled to a very respectful consideration. We welcome to our columns every earnest and thoughtful expression of religious opinions, and are especially pleased that so competent a gentleman is willing frankly to urge the reasons why Unitarians profess their faith in Christianity and Freedom at the same time. With entire respect, therefore, for Mr. Washburn, we will state our own reasons for not concurring in his views.

In the first place, our correspondent fails to recognize the vast difference between the scientific and the Christian senses of the word authority.

The authority of Galileo or of Newton, to whom Mr. Washburn refers, is entirely consistent with mistakes on their part. Newton, for instance, believed in the corpuscular theory of light, which is now universally superseded by the undulatory theory. In the scientific sense of the word, authority merely indicates the natural presumption that a man who has thoroughly studied a subject is more likely to know about it than those who have studied it less. The latter, therefore, are apt to take it for granted that such a man is right, without taking the trouble to verify all his conclusions. But this is always on the supposition that, if they should take this trouble, they would themselves come to the same conclusions. In all cases of scientific authority, the ultimate appeal is confessedly to facts—to Nature; and the possibility of error even by the highest authorities is always explicitly or implicitly acknowledged.

The history of science is full of illustrations, moreover, of the actually injurious influence of scientific reputations which have become so great as to overawe the private judgment. It is owing to the overgrown "authority" of Cuvier, for instance, that French savans have been so slow to recognize the great services of Mr. Darwin to modern science. In the famous dispute in the French Academy, in 1830, between Cuvier and Geoffroy St. Hilaire, in which the latter maintained the mutability of species and the former their immutability, Cuvier won the victory, not because he was right, but because St. Hilaire had not at command the great mass of evidence which has since been brought to light in his favor; and Cuvier's authority, too slavishly relied upon, has had the effect of paralyzing the intellect of France on this subject to the present day—nay, even of making Agassiz, his greatest modern disciple, present the melancholy spectacle of a fine genius hopelessly fighting the spirit of the age. Such is always the effect of authority, if pressed too far even in its scientific sense. Even in science itself, men cannot be too jealous of the independence of private judgment. The dangers of an excessive individualism are far less than those of a too-obsequious reverence for great names.

In religion, however, authority does and must mean complete immunity from error. The "authority of Jesus," for instance, means that in all spiritual matters, at least, his insight was absolutely unerring. If Mr. Washburn means less than this, then it is true that he is "playing with the word authority." We must confess that we are not sure of his meaning. On the one hand, he says he does not "recognize in Jesus" an "imposed and overruling authority;" yet he does recognize him as "the supreme Master in religion." He will pardon us for saying that here we seem to see the eternal inconsistency of Unitarianism cropping out once more. Prof. Everett, as we quoted him recently, says plainly that "we are not to touch upon the limit of his [Jesus'] insight." Will Mr. Washburn say less? If not, he manifestly attributes to Jesus an authority which no scientific man will ever attribute to another—an authority, that is, which is simple infallibility. Hence the parallelism which Mr. Washburn attempts to institute between scientific and religious authority is glaringly fallacious. Christianity will not tolerate any fallible authority in its "supreme Master;" science will not tolerate any infallible authority, nor confess any "supreme Master" at all. And Mr. Washburn will have to choose between these two.

From what has been said, it follows that we are not bound either to show a greater religious teacher, or to acknowledge the authority of Jesus. It is purely a question of history whether Jesus was or was not the greatest religious teacher of the race—a question to us of very little interest. We are not constrained to a choice of “Masters.” We deny the very principle of “Mastership” in religion, as in science. The claim of any man to be our “Master” is insufferably insolent—to be pardoned and overlooked on the score of a thoroughly barbarian conception of human rights, perhaps, when made by Jesus, but to be sternly resisted when made in his name by his organized followers. The pretence that modern society is under any obligation whatever to obey his ideas of right and wrong, or even to inquire what they were, is monstrous. His claim to be consulted is no greater than that of any other. When he speaks as a man to men, he will be heard with as much respect as the intrinsic truth of his words entitles him to—no more. But when he speaks as a “Master” to his slaves, or as a “King and Lord” to his subjects, he will be swept out of the pathway of Humanity like any other feeble pretender.

Instead, therefore, of “acknowledging our allegiance to Jesus as the religious Head of Humanity,” we avow our allegiance to Humanity itself. As to “pointing out a greater religious master than Jesus,” we point to eternal Nature, which taught him, teaches us, and will teach all who shake off this wild delusion of discipleship to a self-constituted “Master.”

THE F. R. A. CONVENTIONS.

That the Free Religious Association should undertake a winter campaign, even a short one, was a bold enterprise. Only the exceptional circumstances which prevented, this year, the holding of the recent Conventions earlier in the season could have justified the resolution to hold them in December. The risk was great that officers and speakers, who had to go from five to eight hundred miles to be present at the meetings, might be “snowed up” on the railways and not reach their destination; or, if they were fortunate to get through on time, that the meetings might be interfered with by rough weather and wintry storms. These are risks which the Free Religious Association, as yet in the infancy of its work, comparatively little known in the country at large, and having no subordinate local organizations to which to appeal, can hardly afford to run. It has lately been said in these columns, and with truth, that its commisariat is not richly furnished. It might have been said that its active army is small. It is therefore very important that it should use its resources prudently and so manage as to bring them to bear on the selected points of attack with the greatest possible effect. The old religious organizations of sectarianism can carry their conventions through by the mere power of their machinery. Their meetings may be small and dull, as they often are, but they can risk all that. They care, indeed, little for it,—for their working force depends upon certain opinions that are already well established in the community, and their conventions are mainly for the purpose of keeping up a certain routine of mechanical operations which their constituencies already understand all about and accept. But the Free Religious Association has the slightest possible organization. It has yet gathered no momentum in the working of its machinery. Its machinery is all of the simplest order. It trusts solely for success in its conventions to the power of the ideas which it represents. It trusts in the truth of its principles, in their adaptedness to existing human needs, and in the ability of its representative speakers to awaken and meet, in the public, an interest in these principles. Having no sort or semblance of ecclesiastical machinery, no sectarian constituency, little money, the freest possible organization, the Free Religious Association, when it appoints a Convention, must be prepared to show its ideas, aims, purposes, and that it is in earnest in presenting them to the people. It must do this, or it fails.

That the Association in appointing these winter Conventions risked a failure indicates at least this,—that it had great confidence in the strength of its principles; in their power ultimately to win public attention, though at present they might be weakly presented. But there was no failure. The clouds threatened, but the great snow did not come. The trains got through, speakers and officers (all who started from home) were on hand in season, and the Conventions, both at Detroit and Syracuse, were held essentially according to the previously published programmes.

The Convention at Detroit, however, was much interfered with by bad weather. It did not storm, but it might nearly as well have stormed in all manner of evil ways. It was fearfully cold; the wind blew down the lakes through the city like a perfect hurricane; and the clouds seemed to be charged with all sorts of malice for Conventions. To add to these discomforts from Nature, the hall in which the Convention was appointed could not be heated in such weather. The thermometer in it refused to rise above 42°. This was rather freezing both to audience and speakers. It was a new test of free religion. There was some prospect of a chance for martyrdom. There must certainly be some “warmth” in it, could it live in such an atmosphere. Yet, with modesty it may be claimed, the test was met unflinchingly. The audiences under such circumstances, it may be safely said, were naturally smaller than they would otherwise have been. Not many people will sit for two or three hours to listen to speeches in a room heated only a few degrees above the freezing point. But those who were there, both hearers and speakers, stood up to the test bravely. The speakers, muffled in overcoats, with little clouds of breath issuing from their mouths as they spoke, yet spoke on; the hearers sat, outwardly frigid, but with occasional demonstrations of inward warmth, and a few went out; and the sessions were held nearly through their allotted time. But after two sessions it was unanimously agreed that the martyr spirit had been sufficiently tested, and that “discretion” would be “the better part of valor;” and so the Convention, unable to secure any other hall, moved into an adjoining side-room of the same establishment,—small and not otherwise convenient, but capable of being warmed. Indeed, a huge stove near the middle of the apartment, filled with generous Michigan logs, threatened a thawing process rather too summary. And in this little room, in which perhaps 150 persons could gather with pretty close packing, the remaining sessions of the Convention were held.

And right good meetings they were. Probably, if we could have foreseen all the unlucky circumstances of weather and hall, we should have said, it is not worth while to go to Detroit at this time. But as I recall those cozy, sympathetic meetings in that little room, after we had passed through our martyrdom and got down to the hard-pan of our most earnest convictions and purposes; as I remember the earnest, inspired and inspiring faces of that little company of auditors, who, after the curiosity-hunters had been sifted out by the cold, continued to come session after session, because they evidently found there food for thought and life, I am instantly impelled to say that it was worth while. The audience, though not large, was of the best quality. And when our Convention closed, it was clear that we had made an impression in Detroit that was not to be transient. The people, we were told, are just beginning to understand you, they are just waking up to the fact that you are here, and if you could go on for another day, in a suitable hall, you would have as large a meeting as you can desire. We regard the Detroit Convention, therefore, as a most successful reconnoitre. As a preliminary meeting, advertising and explaining the Free Religious Association to a company of high-minded, thoughtful, and enterprising people, it was eminently effective. But we must consider this meeting as only preliminary. We must hold another Convention there soon. We must take advantage of the interest just awakened and turn it into the success of a larger gathering next year.

It ought to be added that, though our Detroit friends gave us a cold welcome in their hall, their hearts and homes were warm with the most cordial sympathy and hospitality. It must be said, too, that if the arrangements of the local committee were not wholly successful (though we do not know that they are to be blamed for the defective hall), neither did the provisions of the Committee of the Association come out entirely according to expectation. Two of the speakers that had been engaged and announced to be present, through some misunderstanding of the date of the Convention, were not there. So that, in this respect, things were about even on both sides. Yet it was a success worth following up in another campaign.

Of the Convention at Syracuse we had high expectations. We knew that it was a city of conventions,—that conventions were one of its special entertainments; also that it was a centre of radicalism, that it contained a large number of progressive people believing most thoroughly, though working in somewhat different ways, in religious and social reform. We knew, too, that here had lived and wrought for twenty years one of the truest apostles of free thought and free fellowship in religion that this age has known, Samuel J. May,—whose funeral last summer was a veritable example of a free religious assembly, and whose memory lingers in the community as a persuasive bond of confidence and love among men and women of the most diverse opinions and faiths. Of the meeting at Syracuse we had, then, high hopes. And they were fully realized. It was in almost every particular a model Convention. The local arrangements were excellent; the hospitality of friends unlimited; the hall large, comfortable, and well filled with an intelligent and responsive audience,—sufficiently sympathetic with the utterances of the platform, yet with enough of opposition to add to the interest of addressing it. There were at every session a goodly number of representatives of Orthodoxy present. And the audience was not made up from the city alone. People came from the neighboring towns and from quite distant places; from Rochester, Cortland, Canastota, Utica. Gerrit Smith came up from Peterboro, to lend his venerable and benignant presence. The audience and the local interest were everything that could be desired. Our force of speakers, too, was larger here than at Detroit. We had more local help and also reinforcements from abroad. If we want to go to Detroit again because we so successfully discovered the elements of a grand success next time, we shall want to go to Syracuse again because we had there such a fine success this time. But other places, I fear, will need us more for some time to come.

The subjects considered in these Conventions were these: The Principles and Aims of the Free Religious Movement; The Relations of Religion to the Civil Government in America; The Mission and Character of Jesus; The Doctrine of Divine Providence; The Relation of Religion to Social Science and Philanthropy; The Relation of Free Religion to the Specific Religions and to existing Ecclesiastical Institutions. It must suffice here just to name these subjects, without giving any hint of the essays and addresses upon them. Those people who did not before know of the character of the Free Religious Association discovered, as one of the Detroit papers said, that its assemblies spend no time in disposing of the ordinary routine of business usually incident to religious conventions, but address themselves at once to some of the most vital questions of the day.

There were points about these Conventions that suggest to me other remarks. Some of these I shall take occasion to make in THE INDEX hereafter. Let me close this article with an acknowledgment that is due to the daily press of Detroit and Syracuse for their reports of the meetings. The papers in both cities were exceedingly generous of space in their accounts of the Conventions, and their reports were in the main fair. Sometimes the reporters, unfamiliar with the thoughts uttered, evidently had some difficulty in making a clear abstract of them; but they were courteous, meant to be just, and gave no little care and labor to the work. Purchasing a paper as I took a seat in the cars at Syracuse the day after the Convention there closed, I found three long columns and a half devoted to a report of one day's meetings. And to the opening session the preceding evening, mainly occupied by Mr. Frothingham's address, nearly as much space had been given. So the types helped to scatter hints of the speakers' words far and wide; bringing them, doubtless, to many eyes that would read them with apprehension, and perchance horror, or that would not read them at all,—but bringing them also to eyes, not few, that had been looking with secret longing for just such words, and would see in them the promise of a truer fellowship and a more satisfying faith.

HARD TO SUIT.

Orthodox critics of Free Religion often declare that its advocates have neither earnestness enough nor faith enough in its power over the human heart to carry it to the poor, the vicious, the miserable, the outcast of society; but that they selfishly keep their gospel to themselves.

On the other hand, if any believer in Free Religion actually ventures to proclaim it to such people, these same critics are loud in denunciation of his attempt to destroy the only solace of their wretchedness and the only cure of their wickedness.

The Orthodox are certainly hard to suit.

Just after the Detroit Convention of the Free Religious Association, we were asked by the Superintendent of the Detroit House of Correction to give an address on Saturday afternoon to the prisoners—an audience, he said, of about four hundred and fifty persons, and of quite the average degree of intelligence. Remembering how seldom the evangelical clergy, who contrive usually to manage the religious instruction of such institutions in their own way, suffer the prisoners to hear anything but evangelical teaching, we felt bound not to decline the plain duty of the occasion, and at considerable inconvenience remained in Detroit to discharge it. The result of the experiment is related elsewhere in two articles which we copy from the Detroit Tribune, and which say all that is necessary to be said about it.

A NEW VIEW OF THE FALL OF MAN.

EXTRACT FROM PARKER PILLSBURY'S UNPUBLISHED LECTURE ON "FAITH, KNOWLEDGE, AND WORK IN RELIGION."

In the Bible, the first thing prohibited was knowledge. To know was made a capital crime. God said:—"Yonder stands the tree of knowledge. Touch it not! For in the day that ye eat thereof ye shall surely die." "In the day." Not on the morrow. Not on any other day.

But another came, serpent or Satan named, and said they should not die—the man, nor the woman. "For God doth know," he added, "that in the day ye eat thereof, your eyes will be opened, and ye shall be as Gods, knowing good and evil!"

Which thing came to pass,—did it not?—even though it made God a liar and Satan the first true prophet whose name stands recorded in history!

But the account proceeds further, though still making the matter worse.

There was another tree in the garden, not yet forbidden, the tree of life; which could have averted the whole penalty, even had God determined to execute it, as it seems he never did, though so sternly threatened.

When he saw that Adam and Eve had eaten of the tree of knowledge and become wise, instead of killing them he said:—"Behold, the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil." And now, lest he should put forth his hand and eat of the tree of life and live forever, therefore the Lord drove him forth out of the garden.

Which now of the two spoke truly, God or Satan? The latter said two things, and both proved true. God said one thing, and it did not prove true. Adam did not die, nor Eve; "their eyes were opened, and they became as Gods, knowing good and evil." For God himself said afterwards:—"Behold, the man is become as one of us, knowing good and evil." But Adam was not killed. Nor that wicked wife who tempted his manly innocence! Nor Satan, or the serpent, that seduced her. All survived—Satan to this day! And who can number the descendants of the man and woman, who were so "surely" to die, on the day they should eat of the forbidden tree? Only the trees seem to have died. Nothing was ever heard of them afterwards, in botany or history.

But knowledge has been praised ever since, even in the Bible, the Old Testament part of it; even if the race was indebted to the devil for it at first, as the book itself shows.

King David, King Solomon, and the prophets indited some of their loftiest strains to its praise and honor, and deplored its absence among the people in almost funereal dirges of sorrow.

THE RADICAL ASSOCIATION.

The Radical for December is out late, but is none the worse for that, since it does not depend for its interest on passing events. It is good for all seasons, provided the reader's mood is a high and thoughtful one. We are especially glad to see that the success of THE INDEX in raising the first $50,000 of the Association's stock has stimulated the friends of the Radical to make a similar effort in its behalf. A "Radical Association" is proposed on a basis similar to ours, the capital stock being fixed at $50,000, and the shares at $100, payable in assessments of ten per cent. a year as soon as $25,000 are subscribed. Several thousand dollars have been subscribed already. It was feared at first (we thought needlessly) that the starting of THE INDEX would hurt the Radical. If it should turn out that the success of the Index Association has paved the way for the success of a similar Radical Association, it will be plain enough that our experiment was the best thing that ever happened for the Radical. May this prove to be the case! We shall watch the progress of the movement with sincerest sympathy, believing that this world is too small, and this life too short, and the need of earnest humanitarian work far too great, for the indulgence of petty and contemptible rivalries among those who are toiling in humanity's cause. So success to the Radical Association! Send your subscription for at least one share to S. H. Morse, 25 Bromfield St., Boston.

"PHYSICIAN, HEAL THYSELF."

[From the New York Independent of Dec. 14.]

The Independent is an independent paper. We have announced publicly that its editorial utterances are those of the paper, and that there is no indication made who writes them. In this respect it differs from such a paper as The Index, of Toledo, which is the avowed organ of its editor, Rev. F. E. Abbot, and of nobody else. When we published a criticism of Mr. Abbot's assertion that it takes three dollars to send one to the Heavens, he had no right to charge it to a single editor, and devote several columns to argument with him, instead of with the Independent. It is an unwarrantable personality. And now Mr. Mr. Abbot excuses his personality as resulting from his anxiety to do justice to the other editors of this paper! He says:—

"The Independent is not responsible for his misrepresentations. There are gentlemen connected with The Independent who would scorn to make them, and it would not be just to hold these gentlemen in any degree responsible for them. . . . It is not 'dis-courtesy' or 'personality' in us to hold him personally accountable for the libel, and to acquit his associates of the disgrace."

Mr. Abbot knows more about us than we do ourselves. We will, for once, so far analyze the complex "we" which is wont to speak editorially as to say that the present writer, who some years ago expressed through The Independent the admiration which he still feels for the remarkable philosophical articles of Mr. Abbot in the North American Re-

Communications.

UNITARIANS, AUTHORITY, REASON, AND FREEDOM.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—I see in your issue of Nov. 18, under the heading "Unitarianism," the following statements:—"All the Unitarian Conferences, National or Local, assert at the same time their devotion to Freedom and to Christianity, and thus present the humiliating spectacle of a divided allegiance. . . . This is the actual position of the Unitarian denomination; and there is not a clear intellect in the world that can look upon it with respect." As I am one of those who both hold and respect that position, I should like, barring all question of intellect, to try the matter with you.

You believe in Freedom in astronomy? Yes, no doubt. Do you, then, recognize no authority in Galileo as to the earth's motion, or in Newton as to gravitation? I suppose you do. You recognize the authority of the competent witness; and since you recognize it, it does not at all interfere with your freedom. Rather, in the exercise of your freedom, you acknowledge the authority of these men in these matters. And so of the masters in other departments. May we not, then, freely recognize the authority of Jesus, and so freely assert our devotion to Christianity?

"But," some one may say, "you are playing with the word authority. By authority we mean an absolute and overruling authority, not (as in the case of Galileo) the authority of a competent witness freely recognized." I am not playing with the word, but trying to express the fact. If you mean by authority an imposed and overruling authority, then I do not recognize that in Jesus. But, on the other hand, I do freely recognize him as, humanly speaking and within the range of my knowledge, the supreme Master in religion; and, more than that, I cannot but so recognize him. It is an intellectual necessity with me so to recognize him. There is only one way, as far as I can see, by which we can cease to regard Jesus as our religious Master and Head; and that is by recognizing some other as greater than he, supposing that to be possible. Hence, I think I have a right to ask you either to show us a religious teacher greater than Jesus, that we may learn of him, or to acknowledge the authority of Jesus, or to explain by what right you can refuse your allegiance to the highest religious truth you know, and to the greatest religious teacher.

"But," some one may ask, "if you acknowledge in Jesus only a freely recognized authority, an authority analogous to that of Galileo, why call yourself by his name any more than by Galileo's? Why show such peculiar veneration for him?" Because he is our master in religion instead of in astronomy. Astronomy is a matter of observation and logical inference; religion of faith and holiness, and of our deepest and most inward personal life. We may dissociate the truths of astronomy from the discoverers of them, because they are matters of observation and logical inference. We cannot dissociate a religious faith from its author, because it is something personal. The Gospel of Jesus is the utterance of his inward thought, his personal spirit, as well as the vision of God and of eternity; and hence cannot be dissociated from him.

I affirm these two things, then: first, that in the exercise of our free intelligence, we are bound to "assert our devotion to Christianity," to recognize the authority of Jesus, because Jesus is the greatest religious master, and his Gospel the highest truth known to us; second, that his authority differs from that of the authority of the masters in other departments by as much as religion differs from these other departments, namely, in being the most deeply personal part of our lives.

And in conclusion, I ask of you again, either to show to us a greater religious master than Jesus, and a better doctrine than Christianity, or to acknowledge your allegiance to Jesus as the religious Head of Humanity, or to show what other course is open to a "clear intellect."

Yours truly,

FRANCIS T. WASHBURN.

MILTON, Mass., Dec. 1, 1871.

SPIRITUALISM AGAIN.

MR. EDITOR:—

Mr. MacGraw censures me in No. 97 of THE INDEX for what I said of Spiritualism in my last article (No. 93) and gives a "Defence of Spiritualism." To this I wish to reply.

Mr. MacGraw adduces many "facts" in proof of the truth of Spiritualism; but no argument or scientific reasoning. His "facts" are merely the testimony of those who believe in spirit and their agency. But as no one has yet given to the world the scientific principles of Spiritualism, or the law by which spirits operate upon matter, either immediately or through mediums, this whole testimony rests on the mere assurances of believers. No rational or scientific disbeliever in Spiritualism and its theories has as yet borne testimony to the facts or truth of either. Tyndall, Huxley, Froude and hosts of German savans not only disbelieve in, but distinctly denounce Spiritualism as delusion, and are especially severe on mediums and their performances and "revelations," and though neither they nor I will deny there are a great many wonderful manifestations in Nature for which neither they nor I can satisfactorily account, there is no doubt as to their natural, material character, and that the spirits have nothing whatever to do with them.

Mr. MacGraw also tells us that "Spiritualists do not believe in miracles. They believe and proclaim, that, however strange and singular such manifestations may be, they are the result of a natural cause, and come to us though the agency of some known or unknown natural law." This is Materialism pure and simple. It is not Spiritualism, in as much as it contradicts all the theories of Spiritualism. These manifestations must be miraculous; for how can they be the manifestations of spirits, and at the same time the result of a natural cause? Webster thus defines miracle:—"An event or effect contrary to the established constitution and course of things, or a deviation from the known laws of nature; a supernatural event." Now I should like to know how Mr. MacGraw can harmonise his belief in spirits and their manifestations (evidently miracles according to Webster) and his disbelief in miracles?

Mr. MacGraw takes exception to my statement that the performances of mediums are done in the dark, and that, when any light is suddenly let in, the medium is generally detected in the act of performing all these manifestations himself. He triumphantly says: "Then sometimes, it appears, light is suddenly let in, and the medium is not performing these manifestations. Can Mr. Einstein tell who or what does? These were, of course, facts or manifestations which the sceptics attempted to detect the medium in performing, and he passed the ordeal scathless."

I will answer Mr. MacGraw's query—who or what is it that performs them? Most assuredly not the spirits, but the medium, though he is sometimes too smart to be detected. And if there were facts or manifestations which the sceptics attempted to detect the medium in performing and he passed the ordeal scathless, these also are attributable, not to spirits, but to the dexterity of the medium, or perhaps to the character of the audiences, which are often composed of believers only, who, of course, do not attempt to detect the medium, or of sceptics not smart enough to detect him.

Mr. MacGraw finds also much fault with me for saying: that Spiritualism must first of all prove the existence of spirits before it can assert the truths of Spiritualism; and asks—"What does he mean by the truths of Spiritualism?" He then adds: "I know of no truths contended for by Spiritualists save the great truth that man exists as a living, sentient being after the body is resolved into its original elements, and to prove this they give certain facts which they think cannot be accounted for otherwise than through the agency of disembodied spirits."

This "great truth of Spiritualism," thus worded and in its Spiritualistic sense, is denied by all non-Spiritualists, even by those believing in immortality, or the existence of the soul after death. But to argue this "great truth" would require more space than you, Mr. Editor, are able to grant. I may, perhaps, make it the subject of a future independent article, if you will permit it. Any one, however, might suppose that Mr. MacGraw, after asserting so positively this "great truth" of Spiritualism, would have given us what non-Spiritualists and even men of science cannot give us yet—possible, irrefutable proof, a practical scientific demonstration of it. But he does not do this. The agency of disembodied spirits and their manifestations are self-evident truths for him, for "these witnesses are within hearing of the scratches of his pen!" So he requires us only to take his "certain proofs," the experiences of others in good faith, free from "materialism coldly suspicious of human honesty and human testimony." This is not convincing evidence for "sceptics," who, since Mr. MacGraw's "facts" cannot be examined or scientifically analyzed by any one not having these or similar "experiences," will remain sceptics still.

Mr. MacGraw gives no adequate reply to my remarks on the medium's passing out of the state of trance at will, or, what amounts to the same thing, invariably at the right moment. His theory that "a foreign intelligence for the time being controls the medium," may possibly do well enough for a general explanation of the trance-state, as also for the similar phenomenon of Mesmerism or animal Magnetism, but it does not answer my objections. In Mesmerism it is claimed that the will of the operator is the cause of the phenomena. Possible, because still natural. But in the trance state the spirits are the claimed agents. Impossible, because not natural but supernatural—"miraculous," if you will, according to the above definition of Webster. If we cannot explain satisfactorily, we can at least to some extent understand the controlling agency of a will; but of the controlling agency of a spirit we can neither form any conception, nor explain or understand it. Nevertheless, there may still be some kind of analogy between the trance-state and Mesmerism; but of any analogy between the trance state and a horse driven by a man, as Mr. MacGraw assumes, I am not aware, although I can tell Mr. MacGraw "why a man takes a harness from a horse when he has finished a journey." Even more than this. I can very well explain to Mr. MacGraw how human intelligence controls a horse, while neither he nor I can tell how spirit intelligence can control a medium.

But Mr. MacGraw will, no doubt, see in my scepticism but the verification of the saying that "Materialism and Christian theology may be said to be extreme positions in the field of thought." He may not be wrong in this, but he fails to see that the one is the child of thought, reflection and scientific research, and the other, like Spiritualism itself, the result of superstition, gullibility, and all kinds of humbug.

MORRIS EINSTEIN.

TITUSVILLE, Pa., December 6, 1871.

view, on Space and Time, learns now for the first time that there is any such discordance of opinion in this office, and reiterates the judgment previously expressed that Mr. Abbot's only right course would have been to withdraw the charge, and that the attempt to defend it by putting on its phraseology a nugatory sense was disingenuous logic, deserving the title of prevarication, and quite as absurd as his last defence of his personality. Mr. Abbot's perverse logic surprised us, coming as it did from a man whose purity and simplicity of character we have always honored, and whose rejection of the name of Christian was a marvel of good logic. The mere matter how his words were to be interpreted is a small one, not worth further discussion. The question of missions is one of the most important before the Christian public, and to that we shall often return.

[The above compliments we should have considered generous, under other circumstances; but as we demand justice first, and as Mr. Gladden now repeats for the third time the unjust and absolutely false charge of which he was originally guilty, we have no acknowledgments to make.

As to the opinions of his collaborators in the Independent office we know nothing. Our reference to them was made on the general assumption that they were gentlemen, and would not sanction a slander unworthy of their character as such. No gentleman would charge any one with untruthfulness, unless he were prepared to prove it. This Mr. Gladden now declines to do.

"The mere matter how his [our] words were to be interpreted is a small one, not worth further discussion." Will Mr. Gladden venture to say that, having based a charge of untruthfulness on his interpretation of our words, he has now a right to plead their non-importance as a reason for refusing either to withdraw or to prove this charge? We demand that he do either one or the other. His evasion is as cowardly as it is uncandid. We have absolutely disproved the charge. Mr. Gladden knows it quite as well as our readers; and this sudden discovery of the unimportance of our words is a pusillanimous attempt to avoid confession of a proved libel. He sees that we have left him nothing to say in defence of his slander; yet he persists in it, reiterates it, and refuses to make it good! He would not "dodge" in this manner (to quote his own courteous expression), if he were not fully conscious of the weakness of his position. He would not wince at being held responsible for his words, if he were not aware that their falsity had been exposed. But we intend that our readers, at least, shall see who it is that has "badly damaged his reputation for candor and fairness." The following will be a useful lesson to other Orthodox critics to be either less abusive or less unwary than Mr. Gladden.

Our reply to the complaint that we had failed in courtesy by mentioning Mr. Gladden's name, was that he himself had made a personal attack for which he himself should be held personally responsible. Until this attack was made, we had not mentioned his name at all, but had referred solely to "The Independent." It was his own extreme discourtesy and personality in making the most offensive charge conceivable that justified and called for a personal reply. All this Mr. Gladden perfectly well understands. But he represents to the readers of the Independent that our only "excuse" for mentioning his name is a wholly superfluous and ridiculous tenderness for his brother-editors! In order to render this misrepresentation plausible, he suppresses in his quotation from our columns the words which contain the main reason (not "excuse") why we used his name. We ask our readers to compare the passage as Mr. Gladden above quotes it with the passage as it stands in THE INDEX, No. 102. We said:—

"One word more. Mr. Gladden complains of our 'personality' because we refuse to allow him, in Ku-Klux fashion, to shoot from behind a mask. He prefers to be incognito in his attack, and to be referred to only as 'The Independent.' But 'The Independent,' is not responsible for his misrepresentations. There are gentlemen connected with 'The Independent' who would scorn to make them: and it would not be just to hold these gentlemen in any degree responsible for them. If it is not 'discourtesy' and 'personality' in Mr. Gladden to tax us falsely with 'prevarication,' 'the paltriest sort of dodging,' and so forth, it is not 'discourtesy' or 'personality' in us to hold him personally accountable for the libel and to acquit his associates of its disgrace."

If Mr. Gladden has even a 'minimum allowance of "candor and fairness," he will either prove or retract his original charge. But if he chooses to be silent, as we suspect he will, our readers may judge for themselves with what force a charge of "prevarication" comes from a Christian editor who will stoop to the trick of garbling quotations.—Ed.]

INDEX TRACTS

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no able, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution?" Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single Copies Ten Cents; Six Copies Fifty Cents; Twelve Copies One Dollar.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, is a scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One dollar.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cent.

No. 8.—"The Present Heaven," by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, is a singularly felicitous treatment of a subject that interests everybody. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

- O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
 - THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of Newport, R. I.
 - WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
 - RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
 - J. VILA BLAKE, of Boston, Mass.
 - WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
 - Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 - REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
- Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.
- Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Send $2.00 for one year, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.
TOLEDO OFFICE NO. 90, ST. CLAIR ST.
NEW YORK OFFICE NO. 22, VESSEY ST.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

PUBLICATIONS OF THE Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1871, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains Essays, by John Weiss, on "THE ATTITUDE OF SCIENCE TO RELIGION;" by O. B. Frothingham, on "SUPERSTITION AND DOGMATISM;" and by Wm. J. Potter, on "THE NATURAL GENESIS OF CHRISTIANITY;" also a report of addresses by Dr. Bartol, T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Prof. Denton, A. M. Powell, and others, together with other proceedings of the meeting. Price 35 cents; in packages of five or more 25 cents each.

The ANNUAL REPORTS for 1868, 1869, and 1870 (at 25 cents each), Rev. Samuel Johnson's Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), Rev. W. H. Channing's Essay on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA" (20 cents), Col. T. W. Higginson's Essay on "THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS" (20 cents), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. Potter (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained as above.

W. J. POTTER, Secretary.

NEW TRACTS, Intended to Teach Religion without Superstition

First Series, No. 1 to 20.

Second Series, Just Published—

- 21. Fanaticism: how displayed by well-meaning people in their judgment and action respecting religion in others.
- 22. Let your Faith honor God, not calumniate Him: reject all testimony that speaks ill of God.
- 23. Who Wrote It? a proper and useful inquiry when an unreasonable claim is urged on the ground that "it is written."
- 24. Periodical Prayer: ask when you want to ask; thank when you want to thank; be honest in prayer.
- 25. Hear the other Side: seek an intelligent faith, instead of blindly following ignorance and prejudice.
- 26. Man's Duty to God: above all things do not neglect it; but take care, too, not to be misled in regard to it.
- 27. Penny-wise, Pound-foolish: to claim divine inspiration for unworthy imputation on the divine character.
- 28. A Touchstone for false Teachers: God certainly gave reason and conscience to be our guides.
- 29. Justice and Love vs. Mercy: God's actual method better than the supposed "plan of salvation."
- 30. Prepared to Die: an unveiling of some clerical false pretences.
- 31. "Even as Others?" showing a point of resemblance between the "evangelicals" and those believers whom they stigmatize as "unbelievers."
- 32. Do Men need Salvation? a look towards God directly, not through the dark-stained church-windows.
- 33. Unchangeable: will God ever refuse to welcome the repenting and returning sinner?
- 34. Lost Sinners: men sometimes lose their children; did God ever lose, can he lose, his children?
- 35. Times and Seasons: two false notions considered; one about Friday, one about Sunday.
- 36. Do they really believe it? cases where Orthodoxy follows tradition in opposition to Scripture.
- 37. The Boston Revival and its Leader: methods of operation of Rev. A. B. Earle, professional revivalist.
- 38. He Rejects the Bible: a false charge refuted, and the opposing truth clearly shown.

EITHER SERIES 30 CENTS; BOTH 50 CENTS.
